

The Tea Party and the Constitution

by CHRISTOPHER W. SCHMIDT*

We are dedicated to educating, motivating, and activating our fellow citizens, using the power of the values, ideals, and tenets of our Founding Fathers.

—*Hartford Tea Party Patriots, Mission Statement*¹

Introduction

Just about everyone in the United States professes to love the Constitution. But the Tea Party really loves the Constitution. To an extent that sets it apart from any major social movement of recent memory, the Tea Party has turned to the nation's founding document as the foundation stone of a campaign designed to right the direction of a country believed to have gone astray. Whereas the usual pattern in modern American history has been for the Constitution only to intrude upon the popular consciousness in response to some clearly "constitutional" event—most typically a controversial Supreme Court opinion, occasionally something rarer like a presidential impeachment—today we are in the midst of a national debate over the meaning of the Constitution instigated by a grassroots social movement. Regardless of what one thinks of the Tea Party's politics or its claims about the Constitution, the movement's success in changing the role the Constitution plays in American political discourse should be recognized as one of its most significant achievements. In this Article I dissect the Tea Party as a constitutional movement, examining the ways in which this movement has used the Constitution and demands of constitutional fidelity as a tool of social and political mobilization.

* Assistant Professor, Chicago-Kent College of Law; Faculty Fellow, American Bar Foundation. B.A. 1996, Dartmouth College; M.A. 2000, Ph.D. 2004, Harvard University; J.D. 2007, Harvard Law School. For helpful comments, criticisms, and discussions, I thank Kathy Baker, Chris Buccafusco, Sarah Harding, Steve Heyman, Cesar Rosado, Mark Rosen, Carolyn Shapiro, Brad Snyder, Jill Weinberg, as well as participants in the Midwest Law & Society Retreat, the University of Colorado Law School's Rothgerber Conference, and the Chicago-Kent Faculty Workshop.

1. Our Mission, HARTFORD TEA PARTY PATRIOTS, http://www.thehartfordteapartypatriots.com/index.php?module=pagemaster&PAGE_user_op=view_page&PAGE_id=5&MMN=position=7:7 (last updated Jan. 28, 2010).

The Tea Party contains a welter of oftentimes conflicting agendas, some quite pedestrian, others the disturbing offspring of right-wing conspiracists. Yet within this confusing constellation of ideas and viewpoints, there is a relatively stable ideological core to the Tea Party. This core is particularly evident when one focuses on the vision of the Constitution regularly professed by movement leaders, activists, and supporters. The central tenets of Tea Party constitutionalism can be distilled down to four basic assumptions. One, the solutions to the problems facing the United States today can be found in the words of the Constitution and the insights of its framers. Two, the meaning of the Constitution and the lessons of history are not obscure; in fact, they are readily accessible to American citizens who take the time to educate themselves. Three, all Americans, not just lawyers and judges, have a responsibility to understand the Constitution and to act faithfully toward it. And four, the overarching purpose of the Constitution is to ensure that the role of government, and particularly the federal government, is a limited one; only by following constitutionally defined constraints on government can individual liberties be preserved. When we strip away the layers of cacophonous provocations and political bluster that has come to characterize the Tea Party (particularly as reported in the media), there is a certain coherence and logic to the Tea Party's constitutional project.² For many, the Tea Party has provided a compelling vision of the role of the Constitution in modern American life. Whether one agrees with this vision or not, it should be taken seriously.

A central assumption of this Article is that Tea Party constitutionalism is more than just a collection of controversial claims about the meaning of the Constitution and the intentions of the Founders. One of my goals is to emphasize a distinction between the substantive claims the Tea Party has made about the meaning of the

2. In this Article I do not take on the difficult and important question of how to actually define the Tea Party. While there are nationally oriented Tea Party organizations, such as FreedomWorks and the Tea Party Patriots, the Tea Party has no central organizational apparatus. In order to engage with the Tea Party's constitutional agenda, I focus on the positions and actions taken by people who, for the most part, explicitly align themselves with the Tea Party movement. What I have identified as the central tenets of Tea Party constitutionalism are almost uniformly present in the mission statements of local Tea Party groups and in the published manifestos by Tea Party leaders.

Constitution and the processes by which the Tea Party has sought to make these claims authoritative in American life and politics. Most of the attention given to the Tea Party's constitutional project by the media and legal scholars has focused on the particulars of the constitutional claims that have emerged from the movement. Many are indeed attention-grabbing claims, calling for radical breaks in judicial doctrine and constitutional traditions, and often drawing on tendentious (or simply creative) accounts of the Founding Era and the Constitution's original meaning. In this way, Tea Party constitutionalism has offered an inviting target for criticism and often ridicule. Yet, if one is interested in the ways in which constitutional claims—including ones that initially appear improbable, misguided, even crazy—are developed, mobilized, and eventually gain some level of resonance, then it is necessary to give attention to the quite uncontroversial ways in which the Tea Party has pursued its constitution claims. The central concern of this Article is constitutional practice. As Lawrence G. Sager has written in discussing this concept of constitutional practice, "What makes a constitution interesting is what a people do with it."³ I am interested in what the Tea Party is doing with the Constitution—not just what its members are saying about the Constitution, but where they are making their constitutional claims, to whom, and to what effect.

The Tea Party has created a constitutional movement centered on grassroots educational efforts, community mobilization, and political engagement, with constitutional litigation playing a distinctly secondary role. While the Tea Party Constitution very likely will influence the way the courts interpret the Constitution,⁴ the preferred battleground for the Tea Party's project of constitutional reconstruction is popular mobilization, aimed primarily at educating and mobilizing ordinary citizens and influencing the political process. To understand the Tea Party's constitutional project, we must give attention not only to the content of the Tea Party Constitution, but also the predominantly extrajudicial pathways the Tea Party has chosen for giving practical effect to its reading of the Constitution.⁵

3. LAWRENCE G. SAGER, JUSTICE IN PLAINCLOTHES: A THEORY OF AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL PRACTICE 1 (2004).

4. I discuss this possibility in the context of litigation challenging the constitutionality of the federal health care law in Part IV, infra.

5. The Tea Party movement offers a valuable case study of the ways in which constitutional text and principles can be mobilized in extrajudicial contexts. A recent generation of legal scholars have labeled this "popular constitutionalism." At its most basic level, popular constitutionalism involves the study of constitutional claim-making by

One of the reasons for the striking success of the Tea Party as a constitutional movement has been the highly functional “fit” between the substance of its constitutional claims and the methods by which it has sought to turn these claims into constitutional interpretations that resonate beyond the circle of Tea Party true believers. Put simply, the movement’s conception of the Constitution has proven well suited to its chosen tactics of constitutional mobilization. The Tea Party has coalesced around a constitutional platform that is ready made for popular organization and activism. Tea Party constitutionalism includes a belief that constitutional principles are largely self-evident and readily discoverable in the document’s text, a hagiographical approach to the Founders, and a populist-inflected suspicion of centralized power and embrace of a powerful but ill-defined concept of individual liberty. If confined to the sphere of constitutional litigation, this kind of energized populist rhetoric would much more quickly show its limitations. Yet in the arena of popular constitutional mobilization, the Tea Party’s constitutional vision has proven quite effective. In short, the substance of the Tea Party Constitution lends itself to the processes of popular constitutional mobilization.

This article proceeds in five parts. Part I offers an overview of the concept of popular constitutionalism as it has been articulated in the scholarly literature. Part II presents the basic framework for considering the Tea Party as a popular constitutional movement. Here, I present the basic assumptions driving the Tea Party’s constitutional vision, including a skepticism toward the courts and a commitment to more individualistic approaches to the Constitution; a belief in the need to restore a lost understanding of the Constitution; and a textualist and originalist approach to constitutional interpretation.

The next three parts present the mechanisms by which the Tea Party has sought to inject its constitutional vision into popular consciousness and political practice. Part III looks at the Tea Party’s promotion of constitutional commitment on the part of the American people who lack any formal governing authority. As scholars in this area have shown, nonelites, whose voices may be amplified through social movement mobilization, regularly interpret the meaning of the Constitution, and they often do so in ways that are in direct opposition to judicially defined constitutional doctrine. In my effort to make sense of the Tea Party as a constitutional movement, I draw on the insights of this scholarship. I offer a more extended discussion of the writings in this field of popular constitutionalism and the possible implications of the Tea Party movement on the study of popular constitutionalism in Popular Constitutionalism on the Right: Lessons from the Tea Party, 88 DENVER U. L. REV. 523 (2011).

citizenry through educational outreach efforts. Part IV looks at state-level activism, which includes lobbying for state “sovereignty” and nullification measures, as well as rallying support for possible amendments to the Constitution. Part V looks at national electoral politics, particularly the 2010 congressional elections, which provided the Tea Party a platform for pursuing its constitutional vision through the electoral process.

I then offer in Part V some thoughts about the possible consequences of the Tea Party’s constitutional project. While the most lasting effects of this movement will likely be felt in political and constitutional practice outside the courts, there may very well also be doctrinal implications. As an example of its possible effects on the courts, I consider the Tea Party’s role in the pending constitutional challenge to the federal health care bill.

I. The Tea Party as a Constitutional Movement

The Tea Party has gained attention—and a good deal of criticism—by introducing into the public discussion claims about the Constitution previously confined to the libertarian and conservative fringes.⁶ Yet, despite attaching itself to views of the Constitution that when taken on their own are quite radical and often decidedly unpopular, the Tea Party has been strikingly influential as a constitutional movement. Because of the Tea Party, the American people and their elected representatives are talking about the text and the history of the Constitution more than they had before. Because of the Tea Party, the center of gravity on certain constitutional questions has shifted in the direction of the Tea Party’s limited government reading of the Constitution. (The increasing seriousness of constitutional challenges to the health care bill, discussed further in Part V, is the clearest example of this.) This then raises one of the central puzzles about the Tea Party: Why has this movement been able to attach itself to such a radical vision of the Constitution, yet still make considerable headway in mobilizing its followers and attracting support for its project of constitutional reform? The answer to this puzzle lies less in the substance of the Tea Party’s constitutional claims than in the mechanisms by which the movement has sought to inject its constitutional claims into popular consciousness and political practice.

6. Whether it be Rand Paul questioning the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Joe Miller doing the same with regard to federal minimum wage laws, or Christine O’Donnell challenging the idea of the separation of church and state, figures associated with the Tea Party have regularly made news with their contrarian statements about the meaning of the Constitution.

Creating a popular constitutional movement is no easy task. The Constitution is a document largely written in a style that is dated and legalistic, much of which is confusing or just downright obscure. It is also a document whose meaning the American people and their elected representatives in recent generations have largely delegated to the courts.⁷ Any social movement that attempts to place the Constitution at the center of its reform agenda faces a basic challenge: To locate ways in which movement participants can actively participate in debates about the meaning of the Constitution and its role in American life. For this reason, it is important to consider those aspects of the Tea Party movement that have addressed the challenges inherent in popular constitutional engagement.

The Tea Party's constitutional vision is designed to be mobilized. The core elements of the Tea Party Constitution are relatively easily grasped and they readily lend themselves to translation into tangible political action. Tea Party constitutionalism challenges its adherents to do more than just passively accept its basic tenets. There is, as observers and participants in the movement regularly note, something about Tea Party constitutionalism that is akin to a fundamentalist religious revivalism, with the text of the Constitution serving the role of scripture.⁸ Tea Party leaders encourage supporters to internalize the core principles of the Tea Party Constitution, and then to act to ensure that these principles are acknowledged and accepted by others, particularly those in power. Judges are just one potential target of constitutional conversion, and a rather distant one at that. Much more feasible targets on which to build a grassroots reform movement are the American citizenry and elected officials. Part grassroots social movement, part religious revival, part political campaign, the Tea Party has committed itself to a distinctively democratic and populist pathway to making its constitutional vision a lived reality.

7. See LARRY KRAMER, THE PEOPLE THEMSELVES: POPULAR CONSTITUTIONALISM AND JUDICIAL REVIEW 230–33 (2004); Jamal Greene, Giving the Constitution to the Courts, 117 YALE L.J. 886 (2008).

8. See, e.g., KATE ZERNIKE, BOILING MAD: INSIDE TEA PARTY AMERICA 8 (2010) (“Many described their Tea Party work—recruiting more people into the movement, teaching others about the Constitution—with near religious zeal.”); Samuel G. Freedman, Tea Party Rooted in Religious Fervor for Constitution, N.Y. TIMES, Nov. 5, 2010 (“Rather than viewing the Tea Party as a political phenomenon . . . one might better understand it through the prism of religion. Seen through such a frame, the Constitution is the Tea Party’s bible, and that holy book is embraced as an inerrant text.”).

A. The Protestant Constitution

In Constitutional Faith,⁹ his now classic study of American attitudes toward the Constitution, Sanford Levinson provides a framework that helps to illuminate what is distinctive about the Tea Party's constitutional vision, as well as to offer some historical perspective on the movement. He describes a basic divide between "protestant" and "catholic" approaches to constitutional interpretation.¹⁰ Each category includes two independent variables, one relating to the source base of constitutional interpretation, the other to the location of interpretive authority.¹¹ The "protestant" constitutionalist believes that the written text of the Constitution is the exclusive basis of interpretation and that individual or community readings of the Constitution are legitimate acts of constitutional interpretation.¹² A "catholic" approach basically reverses each of these elements. It places unwritten traditions alongside the written text as legitimate sources for constitutional interpretation, while limiting ultimate authority to interpret the Constitution to a single official institution, the Supreme Court.¹³

Adopting Levinson's typology, we can see that the Tea Party movement is proudly and thoroughly protestant in its posture toward the Constitution. Tea Party constitutionalism rejects hierarchical assumptions about authoritative constitutional interpretation in favor of more individualistic or community-based, decentralized approaches. A dominant theme in the Tea Party literature and rhetoric is a commitment to citizen empowerment.¹⁴ Virginia Attorney General Ken Cuccinelli, who is leading one of the litigation efforts against the federal health care law, told a Tea Party rally that

9. SANFORD LEVINSON, CONSTITUTIONAL FAITH 27–30 (1988).

10. Id.

11. Id.

12. Id.

13. Id.

14. See, e.g., Mission Statement, TEA PARTY WEST, (Sept. 15, 2010) <http://teapartywest.com/?p=220> ("Tea Party West has several ambitions: . . . To education citizens . . . To help prepare these citizens to organize and educate others To empower Americans through education, training"); VERMONT TEA PARTY, Home, <http://www.vermontteaparty.com/> ("[T]he Vermont Tea Party Movement will encourage, empower & inspire Vermonters to embrace their civic duty and become active at whatever political endeavor, at whatever level, that is befitting them to pursue.").

“[i]t’s time for people like you all to step up and draw the lines that our Founding Fathers thought they drew very clearly.”¹⁵ “Millions of Americans,” writes Angelo Codevilla in his 2010 Tea Party polemic, “are now reasserting our right to obey the Constitution to which officials swear allegiance upon taking office, rather than to obey any official.”¹⁶ A foundational premise of Tea Party constitutionalism is that individual citizens can read the document for themselves, come to conclusions about constitutional meaning based on this reading, and act upon these convictions.

B. The Courts and the Tea Party

One of the most notable aspects of Tea Party constitutionalism is the relatively minor place the Tea Party allows for the courts in discussing constitutional issues. Although Tea Party adherents have their preferred justices, and although Tea Partiers would surely be perfectly happy to see the Supreme Court strike down the federal health care law, the Tea Party’s attitude toward the judiciary tends to reside somewhere between animosity and apathy. Court opinions and judicial appointments simply have not been a major part of the constitutional debate sparked by the Tea Party movement.

The relative inattention to the courts reflects a general sense among Tea Party supporters that the Supreme Court is simply not on their side. Angelo Codevilla treats the Supreme Court as an apparatus of the “Ruling Class.” The Court, like the rest of elite society, Codevilla writes, has a “[d]isregard for the text of laws, for the dictionary definition of words and the intentions of those who wrote them.”¹⁷ Courts enforce a “Constitution imagined by the judge and supported by the Ruling Class.”¹⁸ “[T]wo generations of Supreme Court rulings” have taken away “localities’ traditional powers over schools, including standards, curriculum, and prayer” as well as “traditional police powers over behavior in public places.”¹⁹ Randy Barnett, a law professor at Georgetown who has become something of a legal mastermind for the Tea Party, has pushed for a “Federalism Amendment” to the Constitution, which he justifies as a

15. Quoted in Bradford Plumer, The Revisionaries, NEW REPUBLIC, Sept. 23, 2010, at 16.

16. ANGELO M. CODEVILLA, THE RULING CLASS: HOW THEY CORRUPTED AMERICA AND WHAT WE CAN DO ABOUT IT xvii–iii (2010).

17. Id. at 42.

18. Id. at 43.

19. Id. at 71.

way to bypass a federal judicial system that “long ago adopted a virtually unlimited construction of Congressional power.”²⁰

Although local Tea Party groups typically have little or nothing to say about the Supreme Court, some have explicitly attacked the judiciary. For example, the Hartford Tea Party Patriots issued a “Tea Party Declaration of Independence” that included the following proclamation: “We reject the claims of an un-elected Federal Judiciary to violate the separation of powers by demanding its decisions be enforced by the other coequal branches of government, regardless of how unconstitutional the other branches of government may think those decisions are.”²¹ “If we allow the Supreme Court to be the final arbiter in this, we are not a Republic—we are an oligarchy,” said an Idaho citizen who testified in favor of proposed state law that would effectively nullify implementation of federal health care policy within the state. “Our founding fathers would be disgusted with us, if we were to allow that to happen.”²²

C. Constitutional Decline and Revival

The Tea Party movement is pervaded by efforts to resurrect a particular vision of the nation’s early history—from the name “Tea Party,” harkening back to the anti-tax revolt in Boston Harbor in 1773; to the stock rhetoric of the movement, filled with references to the Revolutionary and Founding periods; to the Revolutionary flags and costumes often seen at Tea Party events. Tea Party literature portrays those who created the nation as having special insight into the nature of government and the necessity for vigilance on the protection of individual liberty. Through the force of their insight, they created a system of government that achieved an ideal balance between necessary governing power and personal freedom. They left for posterity the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, works of genius, perhaps even divine inspiration, that have allowed subsequent generations of Americans to take their own measure, to see how well they have protected the essentials of the founding

20. Randy E. Barnett, The Case for a Federalism Amendment, WALL ST. J., Apr. 23, 2009, <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB124044199838345461.html> [hereinafter Barnett, Case for Federalism].

21. Declaration of Tea Party Independence, HARTFORD TEA PARTY PATRIOTS, http://www.thehartfordteapartypatriots.com/index.php?module=pagemaster&PAGE_user_op=view_page&PAGE_id=27&MMN_position=26:26 (last updated Feb. 24, 2010).

22. John Miller, Hundreds go to Idaho hearing on nullification bill, BLOOMBERG BUSINESSWEEK, Feb. 9, 2011, <http://www.businessweek.com/ap/financialnews/D9L9FJT01.htm>

covenant. When the nation strays off course, these documents, accessible to all and plain in their meaning, offer guidance for returning the nation to its first principles. Thus runs the standard Tea Party narrative of the Founding Era and its ongoing role in guiding American society.

This idealizing vision of the past and of the essential character of the American nation is coupled in the Tea Party mindset with a deep sense of disillusionment with the contemporary situation. A dominant theme of Tea Party ideology is a sense that contemporary society is in decline. According to Codevilla, over the course of the twentieth century the United States government has been taken over by elites, “[e]ach succeeding generation . . . less competent than its predecessor.”²³ As a result, government over the past century has “generally made life worse” for the American people.²⁴ The Tea Party’s sense of social and political decline is evident in opinion polls. While the economic downturn has caused marked increases in pessimism toward the direction of the country, among Tea Party supporters this pessimism is near unanimous.²⁵ The nation, according to Sarah Palin’s apocalyptic assessment, is on a “road to ruin.”²⁶ “The Tea Party is bound by a deep sense of betrayal . . .,” wrote a Washington Post reporter after spending a weekend in the fall of 2010 traveling with a group bound for Glenn Beck’s “Restoring Honor” rally on the Washington Mall.²⁷

For the Tea Party, the Constitution plays a central role in assessing the ills that infect modern America. The federal government’s abandonment of the governing vision of the original Constitution demonstrates the extent of decline, while demands for increased fidelity to constitutional principles constitute the central pathway for stemming the decline. As W. Cleon Skousen, the late ultra-

23. CODEVILLA, supra note 16, at 15.

24. Id. at xix.

25. A New York Times/CBS poll conducted in April 2010 found that among Tea Party supporters 92% of respondents agreed with the statement that “things in this country . . . have pretty seriously gotten off on the wrong track.” ZERNIKE, supra note 8, at 199. Among all people polled, 59% agreed with this statement. Id. See also Susan Page & Naomi Jagoda, What is the Tea Party? A Growing State of Mind, USA TODAY, July 1, 2010, http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/2010-07-01-tea-party_N.htm (reporting similar polling numbers).

26. Palin: America out of step with Reagan’s values, USA TODAY (Feb. 5, 2011), http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/2011-02-05-palin-reagan_N.htm.

27. Bill Donahue, Tea Party Road Trip: What the Movement Wants—and Why, WASH. POST, Oct. 24, 2010, at W09.

conservative conspiracy theorist whose work has become widely influential in the Tea Party,²⁸ warned in his 1985 guidebook to the Constitution, “Our ship of state is far out to sea and is being tossed about in stormy waters, which the Founders felt could have been avoided if we had stayed within sight of our original moorings.”²⁹ One hears among Tea Partiers and their allies a constant refrain of metaphors of stability to describe the Constitution and the ideals of the Founders. It is a “mooring,” an “anchor”; it is the nation’s “bedrock.”³⁰ In the words of Tea Party favorite Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, “belief in self-reliance, limited government and the Constitution hold the keys to fixing our problems and getting our nation back on track.”³¹

As indicated by this belief in the Constitution as a homing beacon for a nation that has lost its course, the flipside of the narrative of constitutional declension is the narrative of constitutional revival. “First and foremost,” proclaim FreedomWorks’ leaders Dick Armey and Matt Kibbe, “the Tea Party movement is concerned with recovering constitutional principles in government.”³² The rhetoric of constitutional revivalism has sounded particularly clearly from those figures in the Tea Party movement who have sought to inject a more explicit sense of spiritualism into the discussion. Consider, for example, the following accounts by two leading figures of the Tea Party movement. One was offered by Christine O’Donnell, the

28. Skousen had a long history of involvement with fringe right-wing causes. An active member of the John Birch Society, a devout Mormon, and an obsessive anticommunist, he was so extreme in his political beliefs that eventually his own church and most mainstream conservatives distanced themselves from him. His posthumous breakthrough with the Tea Party movement came when Glenn Beck began promoting his work. On Skousen’s influential role in the Tea Party, see generally Sean Wilentz, Confounding Fathers: The Tea Party’s Cold War Roots, NEW YORKER, Oct. 18, 2010, at 32; Jeffrey Rosen, Radical Constitutionalism, N.Y. TIMES MAG., Nov. 26, 2010, at 34.

29. W. CLEON SKOUSEN, THE MAKING OF AMERICA: THE SUBSTANCE AND MEANING OF THE CONSTITUTION 11 (1985).

30. See, e.g., Charles Krauthammer, Constitutionalism, WASH. POST, Jan. 7, 2011, at A19 (“In choosing to focus on a majestic document that bears both study and recitation, the reformed conservatism of the Obama era has found itself not just a symbol but an anchor.”); Seth Stern, Republicans Turn to Constitutionalism to Rein in Authority, CQ WEEKLY, Jan. 10, 2011, at 110 (quoting Frank Anderson, campaign volunteer for Tea Party-backed congressman Jason Chaffetz of Utah).

31. Rand Paul, Rand Paul, libertarian? Not quite, USA TODAY (Aug. 9, 2010), http://www.usatoday.com/news/opinion/forum/2010-08-10-column10_ST2_N.htm.

32. DICK ARMEY & MATT KIBBE, GIVE US LIBERTY: A TEA PARTY MANIFESTO 66 (2010).

Republican nominee for the U.S. Senate from Delaware. When Barack Obama was elected, she explained:

The conservative movement was told to curl up in a fetal position and just stay there for the next eight years, thank you very much. Well, how things have changed. During those dark days when common sense patriotic Americans were looking for some silver lining, they stumbled upon the Constitution [T]he Constitution is making a comeback. It's simply unprecedented in my lifetime. I think it's a little like the chosen people of Israel and the Hebrew scriptures, who cycle through periods of blessing and suffering and then return to the divine principles in their darker days. It's almost as if we're in a season of constitutional repentance. When our country's on the wrong track, we search back to our first covenant, our founding documents, and the bold and inspired values on which they were based. Those American values enshrined in the Declaration provide the real answer.³³

The other story of constitutional revivalism comes from Fox News celebrity host Glenn Beck. Beck, characteristically, offered a distinctly personalized account:

[D]uring parts of 1997 and 1998 I experienced one of the most difficult periods of my life I began to see the massive problems that we—as a nation and as a people—were facing Then one day in the spring, I was walking down the Avenue of the Americas in Manhattan and the answer came to me. It was so dramatic that it made me stop in the middle of the sidewalk and laugh out loud The questions that we face were foreseen by the greatest group of Americans to ever live; our Founding Fathers. They knew we would be grappling with issues like the ones we face today at some point, so they designed a ship that could withstand even the mightiest storm. They also knew that we would eventually lose our way and that we would need a beacon to lead our way back.³⁴

As these excerpts show, religion—and particularly the evangelical and fundamentalist strains within Christianity—is a key

33. Christine O'Donnell, Speech at 2010 Values Voter Summit in Washington, D.C. (Sept. 16, 2010) available at Atmain, (Sept. 17, 2010) <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NYLFZxVN7OQ> (quoted material begins at 2:29).

34. Glenn Beck, Foreword to W. CLEON SKOUSEN, THE 5000 YEAR LEAP: THE 28 GREAT IDEAS THAT CHANGED THE WORLD, at xiii (2009) [hereinafter SKOUSEN, 5000 YEAR LEAP].

element of Tea Party constitutionalism. There is some tension between the tropes of religious revivalism often found in Tea Party statements about the role of the Constitution and the efforts of movement leaders to sideline the contentious social issues, including religion, that have largely defined modern conservatism. The Tea Party has had considerable success in focusing on the issues of constitutionally limited government and fiscal responsibility and, for the most part, putting to the side debates over religion, as well as gay rights and abortion.³⁵ Yet religion, like other social conservative commitments, is never far from the surface of the Tea Party movement. Much of this has to do with the basic demographics of the Tea Party: Its members are more religious than the general population.³⁶ One survey found that Tea Party supporters were considerably more likely than the general populace to believe in the literal truth of the Bible.³⁷ So even if the Tea Party has successfully been able to shift the focus from religion and other potentially divisive social issues, the movement's constitutional project is still drawing on the tropes of evangelical religion in ways that seem to

35. Amy Gardner, Gauging the Scope of the Tea Party Movement in America, WASH. POST, Oct. 24, 2010 (concluding, after a survey of local Tea Party groups, that “[s]ocial issues, such as same-sex marriage and abortion rights, did not register as concerns”); ZERNIKE, supra note 8, at 42, 70, 143–44. Michael Patrick Leahy, a leading Tea Party organizer, wrote:

The Tea Party movement has rejected the discussion of social issues as an unwanted distraction that will hurt the movement's ability to accomplish its constitutional and fiscal objectives. I know this because I helped start the movement, and I have participated in hundreds of conferences calls where this position has been deliberated and confirmed—both publicly and privately—innumerable times The social issues that motivated the Moral Majority in the 1970s and 1980s, and the Christian Coalition in the 1990s, are considered secondary to the preservation of the republic.

Michael Patrick Leahy, Bruce Bartlett's Intellectually Dishonest Smear of the Tea Party Movement, AM. THINKER, June 10, 2010, http://www.americanthinker.com/2010/06/bruce_bartletts_intellectually.html.

36. See, e.g., The Tea Party and Religion, PEW FORUM ON RELIGION & PUBLIC LIFE (Feb. 23, 2011), <http://www.pewforum.org/Politics-and-Elections/Tea-Party-and-Religion.aspx#rtn1> (Tea Party supporters are considerably more likely to reference religion as a basis for their conservative commitments); John B. Judis, Tea Minus Zero, NEW REPUBLIC, May 27, 2010 (citing polling that found “[63] percent [of Tea Party supporters] are in favor of public school students learning that ‘the Book of Genesis in the Bible explains how God created the world’”; and “62 percent think that ‘the only way to Heaven is through Jesus Christ’”).

37. Constitutional Attitudes Survey, Cross Tabs—Tea Party Movement, Sept. 15, 2010, available at http://www.law.columbia.edu/fac/Nathaniel_Persily.

resonate with many Tea Party supporters. It is one of the key elements of religious fundamentalism, faith in the sanctity of a foundational text, to which I now turn.

D. The Power of Text

The Tea Party's commitment to textualism as a method of constitutional interpretation is closely related to the narratives about constitutional decline and revival. If one believes, as Tea Party supporters overwhelmingly do, that government and society is heading in the wrong direction, then the idea of returning to the wisdom of some past moment makes sense. Holding tight to constitutional commitments made generations, even centuries earlier is a way of fighting against decline—of fighting against the direction of modern society and government. This fundamentalist principle, translated into the populist rhetoric of a social movement, is at the heart of the Tea Party's constitutional vision.

While textualism and originalism are distinguishable as methodologies of constitutional interpretation, the version of textualism that one finds in the Tea Party tends to conflate the two. The reason the words of the document must be elevated above all else—above subsequent interpretations of the text, even by the highest court in the land; above established political practice; above settled societal assumptions about the Constitution—is because these words are the product of a particular moment of insight and inspiration. By taking the words seriously, by reading them according to their plain meaning, one is expressing fidelity not only to a document, but to a generation of past Americans who, quite simply, knew more about the principles of liberty and power than any generation since. In this way, textualism and originalism join as a common project, both reinforced by the more general assumption that we are a society in decline, with the Constitution providing a beacon of redemption.

Beyond reinforcing the value of expressing fidelity to the principles of the Founding Era, a commitment to textualism serves an additional role for the Tea Party: It is a powerful tool for constitutional mobilization. Textualism, perhaps more than any other method of constitutional interpretation, has a distinctive common-sense appeal. It is easy to explain to nonlawyers. As Dick Armey, former House Majority leader and now Chairman of FreedomWorks, likes to tell audiences, “If you don't understand the Constitution, I'll buy you a dictionary.”³⁸ Codevilla echoes this sentiment: All that is needed to understand the meaning of the Constitution is “the dictionary and grammar book.”³⁹ A popular Tea Party bumper sticker reads: “I have this crazy idea the Constitution actually means something.”⁴⁰ The idea that complex methods of constitutional interpretation are just ways in which experts obscure the meaning of the Constitution fits comfortably with the populist sensibility of the Tea Party.

From the perspective of creating a popular constitution movement, even more valuable is the fact that this kind of common-sense textualism⁴¹ is easily performed. It is readily turned into various forms of action, into constitutional practice.⁴² If one believes that the text of the Constitution contains the essence of constitutional meaning, then the act of constitution education can begin (and perhaps even end) with a reading of a document that is not particularly long and that, for the most part, is readable to modern Americans. The act of passing out pocket Constitutions, the act of reading the text of the Constitution aloud in small groups or in public settings, even on the floor of Congress—all of these ostensibly symbolic acts contain a deeper significance if grounded in a belief that the text of the document and its underlying meaning are one and the same. The Tea Party offers a clear example of how text-centered approaches to constitutional interpretation can be a powerful basis for popular constitutional organization and activism.

E. Populist Originalism

One of the defining characteristics of Tea Party constitutionalism is the enthusiastic embrace of originalism as its preferred methods of constitutional interpretation. As radio show host Mark Levin writes in his 2009 bestseller, Liberty and Tyranny,

38. ZERNIKE, supra note 8, at 67.

39. CODEVILLA, supra note 16, at 44.

40. Liberty Stickers, LIBERTYSTICKERS.COM, http://www.libertystickers.com/product/I_have_crazy_idea_the_constitution_MB.

41. That is, textualism coupled with a belief in the self-evident nature of constitutional meaning.

42. See, e.g., Reva B. Siegel, Text in Contest: Gender and the Constitution from a Social Movement Perspective, 150 U. PA. L. REV. 297, 299 (2001) (“It is, most often, as text that the Constitution is the object of social movement struggle. Text matters in our tradition because it is the site of understandings and practices that authorize, encourage, and empower ordinary citizens to make claims on the Constitution’s meaning.”) (emphasis omitted).

The Conservative is an originalist, for he believes that much like a contract, the Constitution sets forth certain terms and conditions for governing that hold the same meaning today as they did yesterday and should tomorrow. It connects one generation to the next by restraining the present generation from societal experimentation and government excess. There really is no other standard by which the Constitution can be interpreted without abandoning its underlying principles altogether.⁴³

In various forms, this basic defense of originalism echoes throughout the Tea Party movement. The Constitution “meant one thing when it was written, and it still means the same thing,” declared a speaker at an April 2009 Tea Party rally in Athens, Texas. “It’s up to us to light a fire under our fellow citizens.”⁴⁴

The Tea Party has promoted what we might call extrajudicial or populist originalism—originalism as a mode of constitutional interpretation outside the courts, a practice by people whose primary focus is political and social activism rather litigation. For the populist originalist, the belief that constitutional fidelity requires returning to the Constitution as it was understood at the time of its framing applies not only to judges; it applies but to everyone, including citizen activists who seek to mobilize their fellow citizens around particular constitutional claims.

The rise of populist constitutionalism is particularly noteworthy since the primary grounds on which originalism has been promoted (mostly by conservative constitutional scholars and judges) has been the way it constrains judicial discretion.⁴⁵ “For the last quarter-century,” writes Jamal Greene, “originalism has been the idiom of

43. MARK R. LEVIN, LIBERTY AND TYRANNY: A CONSERVATIVE MANIFESTO 36 (2009).

44. Lauren Ricks, Anyone for T.E.A.?: 300 gather at county courthouse to protest more taxes, ATHENS DAILY REV., Apr. 15, 2009. “I came because I want our country restored to our founding principles,” explained an attendee at the rally. Id.

45. See, e.g., Eric A. Posner, Why Originalism Is So Popular, NEW REPUBLIC, Jan. 14, 2011 (“[S]uperficially, originalism seems simple, commonsense, and nonpartisan: an antidote to the politicization of the judiciary and the judicial appointments process So the Court seems politicized to people on both sides of the political spectrum, and originalism increasingly presents itself as an attractive, neutral-seeming method for getting the Court back on track.”); Jeffrey Rosen, If Scalia Had His Way, N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 9, 2011, at WK 1.

judicial restraint in the United States.”⁴⁶ Conservative talk radio star Rush Limbaugh has embraced originalism as “[t]he only antidote to . . . judicial activism.”⁴⁷ Originalism, according to its most prominent proponent, Justice Scalia, is the “lesser evil”⁴⁸ because it provides grounds for constitutional interpretation that restrains members of the bench.⁴⁹

Yet Tea Partiers are originalists even though the fundamental rationale for originalism, the subjugation of unelected judges to the will of the majority (as expressed during past periods of constitutional ratification), would not seem to apply. A central reason for this phenomenon of populist originalism can be traced to the cultural resonance of originalism as a form of ancestor worship and search for stable values.

As Max Lerner wrote in 1937, populist worship of the Founding Fathers and the Constitution has been particularly powerful during times of uncertainty and concern over the direction of the nation. The Constitution serves as a “safe haven” for those who fear the United States is failing to live up to its founding ideals. Lerner’s description is worth quoting because it well describes the Tea Party’s approach to the Constitution, while also illuminating the historical tradition into which it fits.

Here was the document into which the Founding Fathers had poured their wisdom as into a vessel; the Fathers themselves grew ever larger in stature as they receded from view; the era in which they lived and fought became a golden age; in that age there had been a fresh dawn for the world, and its men were giants against the sky; what they had fought for was abstracted from its living context and became a set of “principles,” eternally true and universally applicable. . . . The Golden Age had become a political instrument.⁵⁰

46. Jamal Greene, On the Origins of Originalism, 88 TEX. L. REV. 1, 2 (2009) [hereinafter Greene, Origins]; see also Jamal Greene, Selling Originalism, 97 GEO. L.J. 657, 680–81 (2009) [hereinafter Greene, Selling] (describing Attorney General Edwin Meese’s defense of originalism as essential to constraining the judiciary).

47. Quoted in Greene, Origins, supra note 46, at 11.

48. Antonin Scalia, Originalism: The Lesser Evil, 57 U. CIN. L. REV. 849 (1989).

49. ANTONIN SCALIA, A MATTER OF INTERPRETATION: FEDERAL COURTS AND THE LAW 46–47 (1997) (“The people will be willing to leave interpretation of the Constitution to lawyers and law courts so long as the people believe that it is (like the interpretation of a statute) essentially lawyers’ work—requiring a close examination of text, judicial precedent, and so forth.”).

50. Max Lerner, Constitution and Court as Symbols, 46 YALE L.J. 1290, 1299 (1937); see also Edward S. Corwin, The Constitution as Instrument and as Symbol, 30 AM. POL.

The idea of the Founding Era as a “Golden Age” is central to the Tea Party’s constitutional project. Frequent references to “the Founders” has become something of a tic for many leading Tea Party figures. Discussions of policy and principle seemingly invariably end up at some point referencing the Founders as support. Newly elected U.S. Senator from Utah Mike Lee said he would refuse to vote for any legislation unless he could “imagine myself explaining to James Madison with a straight face why what I was doing was consistent with the text and history of the Constitution”⁵¹ The National Center for Constitutional Studies offers courses designed to teach “where the founding Fathers got their ideas for sound government and how a return to these ideas can solve our nation[’s] problems today.”⁵²

And then there is Glenn Beck. Perhaps no major figure of the Tea Party has done more to insist that the Founders must be at the forefront of contemporary policy discussions than Beck. “In order to restore our country,” he has said, “we have to restore the men who founded it on certain principles to the rightful place in our national psyche.”⁵³ Beck has called for a “Refounding.”⁵⁴ The Beck-inspired “9-12 Project” has identified nine principles for its followers, each supported with a quotation from Jefferson or Washington.⁵⁵ The group also calls on its followers to meet regularly with family and neighbors to “[d]iscuss the importance of what the Founders designed

SCI. REV. 1071, 1072 (1936) (“American constitutional symbolism looks . . . to the past and links hands with conceptions which long antedate the rise of science and its belief in a predictable, manageable causation. Its consecration of an already established order of things harks back to primitive man’s terror of a chaotic universe, and his struggle toward security and significance behind a slowly erected barrier of custom, magic, fetish, tabu.”) (emphasis in original).

51. Senator-Elect Michael S. Lee, Address at the 2010 National Lawyers Convention (Nov. 19, 2010) [hereinafter Lee Address], available at http://www.fed-soc.org/publications/pubid.2020/pub_detail.asp.

52. Course Materials Description Page, NATIONAL CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL STUDIES, <http://www.ncsstore.com/American-Government-US-Constitution-Part-1/productinfo/AMGOV1>.

53. JILL LEPORE, THE WHITES OF THEIR EYES: THE TEA PARTY’S REVOLUTION AND THE BATTLE OVER AMERICAN HISTORY 156 (2010) (quoting Glenn Beck, The Glenn Beck Show, Fox News television broadcast (Apr. 30, 2010)).

54. Glenn Beck, Glenn Beck Reveals the Plan, GLENN BECK (Nov. 26, 2009), <http://www.glennbeck.com/content/articles/article/198/33398/>.

55. Our Principles & Values, THE 9/12 PROJECT, <http://the912-project.com/about/the-9-principles-12-values/>.

for America.”⁵⁶ “When you read these guys [the Founders], it’s alive,” Beck once said on his show. “It’s like, you know, reading the scriptures. It’s like reading the Bible. It is alive today. And it only comes alive when you need it.”⁵⁷

This last point—that the Founders and the Constitution they drafted is “alive today” is central to Tea Party ideology. For the Tea Party, the past is anything but a foreign country.⁵⁸ The Founders—their ideas, their personalities—are present with us today. Their portraits, their words, even their modern avatars (in the form of historical reenactors) are regularly found at Tea Party events. The Founders are also generally portrayed as comfortable companions. They are not only admirable and likable, but they also tend to agree with the Tea Party.⁵⁹

Another common Tea Party assumption that further fuels its followers’ commitment to originalism is the idea that the Founders were remarkable not only for the force of their ideas, but also for their general agreement upon these ideas. “One of the most amazing aspects of the American story,” wrote Skousen, “is that, while the nation’s Founders came from widely divergent backgrounds, their fundamental beliefs were virtually identical.”⁶⁰

It is worth noting that the populist originalism that the Tea Party practices varies in key aspects from originalism as it is currently practiced in the courts and by legal scholars. Tea Party populist originalism focuses on the Founding Fathers. It focused primarily on a handful of larger-than-life figures who played central roles in creating the new nation. Tea Party originalism thus tends to be an

56. Start a Group, THE 9/12 PROJECT, <http://the912-project.com/find-a-group/start-a-group/>.

57. LEPORE, supra note 53, at 157 (quoting Glenn Beck, The Glenn Beck Show (Fox News television broadcast May 7, 2010)).

58. L. P. HARTLEY, THE GO-BETWEEN (1953) (opening with the sentence: “The past is a foreign country: they do things differently there.”). This point is a central theme of Jill Lepore, supra note 53. See, e.g., id. at 137 (“In the far right, where originalism has slipped into fundamentalism, where historical scholarship is taken for conspiracy and the founding of the United States has become a religion, it’s not the past that’s a foreign country. It’s the present.”).

59. See, e.g., Adam Nagourney, Tea Party Choice Scrambles in Taking on Reid in Nevada, N.Y. TIMES, Aug. 18, 2010, at A1 (Sharron Angle, in response to Harry Reid’s criticism that she was too conservative, suggested that “they probably said that about Thomas Jefferson and George Washington and Benjamin Franklin And truly, when you look at the Constitution and our founding fathers and their writings . . . you might draw those conclusions: That they were conservative. They were fiscally conservative and socially conservative.”).

60. SKOUSEN, MAKING OF AMERICA, supra note 29, at 10.

inquiry into the original intent of the Constitution's framers. This places Tea Party originalism somewhat in tension with the mode of original inquiry now dominant in the courts and in the academy—public meaning originalism—which focuses on how people at the time of framing and ratification would have understood the meaning of the words in the Constitution. (In practice, it is hard to find much difference in the outcomes of those who follow an original meaning versus an original intent approach,⁶¹ although the difference is critical to proponents of originalism.) Take, for example, the mission statement of the Tea Party Patriots, a national umbrella organization of the movement: “We, the members of The Tea Party Patriots, are inspired by our founding documents and regard the Constitution of the United States to be the supreme law of the land. We believe that it is possible to know the original intent of the government our founders set forth, and stand in support of that intent.”⁶² The Republican Party's Pledge to America, issued during the 2010 mid-term elections and clearly reflecting the influence of the Tea Party on the party platform and rhetoric, includes a commitment “to honor the Constitution as constructed by its framers and honor the original intent of those precepts that have been consistently ignored—particularly the Tenth Amendment”⁶³

II. Educational Outreach

Perhaps more than any major social movement in modern American history, Tea Party followers take to heart Franklin Roosevelt's call on the nation, in his 1937 fireside chat, to actually read the Constitution. “Like the Bible,” Roosevelt said, “it ought to be read again and again.”⁶⁴ Touting the value of educating Americans about their Constitution is, of course, nothing new. Speaking on the fiftieth anniversary of the Constitution, John Quincy Adams urged his audience to “[t]each the [Constitution's] principles, teach them to your children, speak of them when sitting in your home, speak of

61. Greene, Origins, supra note 46, at 10.

62. Mission Statement, TEA PARTY PATRIOTS, <http://www.teapartypatriots.org/mission.aspx>.

63. A Pledge to America: The 2010 Republican Agenda, GOP.GOV, <http://pledge.gop.gov/>. U.S. CONST. amend. X (“The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.”).

64. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Fireside Chat, Mar. 9, 1937, available at <http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/index.php?pid=15381>.

them when walking by the way, when lying down and when rising up, write them upon the doorplate of your home and upon your gates.”⁶⁵ Warren Burger, who retired from the bench in order to coordinate the Constitution’s bicentennial celebration, repeated these words in a speech in 1987.⁶⁶ Yet while this kind of constitutional celebrationism has a long history, it is nonetheless notable that a social movement would so fully internalize, through both rhetoric and action, this “protestant” approach to the Constitution.

“We need to talk about and learn about the Constitution daily,” said Jeff Luecke, a Tea Party organizer from Dubuque, Iowa, expressing a commonplace sentiment among the Tea Party faithful.⁶⁷ Glenn Beck regularly rails against the lack of schooling about the Constitution,⁶⁸ and has called on his listeners to act as a “constitutional watchdog for America.”⁶⁹ “Only citizens’ understanding of and commitment to law can possibly reverse the patent disregard for the Constitution and statutes that has permeated American life,” writes conservative polemicist Angelo Codevilla.⁷⁰ One Tea Party-affiliated campaign—called “Save the Constitution—Read It!”—has as its mission to “encourage patriots everywhere to do two things: 1. Commit to reading The Constitution and review it often. 2. Encourage others to read the Constitution.”⁷¹ The campaign promotes a six-point constitutional commitment plan:

1. Commit to reading the Constitution today and reviewing it often.
2. Make a goal and write it down.
3. Mark your calendar to review the Constitution on the 17th of each month.

65. Quoted in LEVINSON, supra note 9, at 12.

66. Id.

67. Philip Rucker & Krissah Thompson, Two New Rules will Give Constitution a Starring Role in GOP-Controlled House, WASH. POST, Dec. 30, 2010.

68. Plumer, supra note 15, at 16.

69. Ian Millhiser, Rally ‘Round the “True Constitution,” AM. PROSPECT, Aug. 25, 2009.

70. Angelo M. Codevilla, America’s Ruling Class—And the Perils of Revolution, AM. SPECTATOR, July–Aug. 2010, at 36.

71. Save the Constitution—Read It!, SAVEITREADIT.ORG, <http://www.saveitreadit.org>. The campaign was developed by a group called “As a Mom . . . A Sisterhood of Mommy Patriots.” See AS A MOM . . . A SISTERHOOD OF MOMMY PATRIOTS, <http://www.asamom.org>.

4. Tell a friend about your goal.
5. Better yet, read it with a friend.
6. Place pocket Constitutions in your car or near your favorite chair.⁷²

“You Can’t Defend What You Don’t Know!” announces an advertisement for ConstitutionalBootCamp.com, which promotes a course designed to turn one into “a truly Empowered Patriot & Defender of our Constitution.”⁷³ The Plymouth Rock Foundation, founded in 1970 to emphasize the nation’s Christian heritage, has recently promoted a study-group approach to spreading the constitutional gospel. “[W]e publish materials, where you can study the Constitution line by line, from its original intent, and what was meant by the founders,” the group’s executive director explained. “You can study in small groups [W]e need to reeducate ourselves, because the present education system won’t.”⁷⁴ The Tea Party Patriots sells a “Constitution Coloring Activity Book” for children. The book “will help children and parents gain a better understanding of the Constitution and the events shaped [sic] our nation,” explains the website. “Our nation faces troubling times because of a lack of constitutional education. Never be a part of that apathy again. Help us teach our children about the principles of liberty and the Constitution.”⁷⁵

Tea Party activists regularly compare their constitution classes to Catholic catechism⁷⁶ or Bible study.⁷⁷ They often proudly carry copies

72. Commit to read the Constitution and review it often, SAVEITREADIT.ORG, <http://www.saveitreadit.org>.

73. Advertisement Flyer for ConstitutionalBootCamp.com, <http://files.meetup.com/1413559/Bootcamp%20Flyer.pdf>; CONSTITUTIONALBOOTCAMP.COM, <http://www.ConstitutionalBootCamp.com>.

74. LEPORE, supra note 53, at 5.

75. Tea Party Patriots Constitution Coloring Activity Book, Just for Patriots!!, TEA PARTY PATRIOTS, <http://www.teapartypatriots.org/ColoringBook.aspx> (last visited Sept. 30, 2011).

76. ZERNIKE, supra note 8, at 79.

77. Philip Rucker & Krissah Thompson, Two New Rules will Give Constitution a Starring Role in GOP-Controlled House, WASH. POST, Dec. 30, 2010. (describing a Beth Mizell, a local Tea Party organizer, comparing weekend classes on the Constitution to a church Bible study); Jill Lepore, The Commandments: The Constitution and Its Worshippers, NEW YORKER, Jan. 17, 2011, at 76 (“Many people are now reading [the

of the Constitution, and pocket copies are regularly distributed at Tea Party events.⁷⁸ Book-length Tea Party polemics regularly include the text of the Constitution as an appendix, often supplemented with other documents from the Founding Era.⁷⁹ A group called Let Freedom Ring holds public readings of the Constitution.⁸⁰ Tea Party groups in Tennessee converged on the state capitol as the 2011 legislative session was about to begin with two primary demands: A state law that would give individuals the ability to opt out of national health care requirements, and more teaching about American history and the Constitution in the public schools.⁸¹ Some Tea Party groups have requested opportunities to go into schools to talk about the Constitution.⁸²

An organization that has been particularly influential in defining and promoting the Tea Party's constitutional vision is the Skousen-founded National Center for Constitutional Studies ("NCCS"). Now based in Arizona, NCCS is known for workshops on the Constitution it holds around the country, at which it promotes Skousen's writings.⁸³ (Skousen was explicit that his intent in The 5000 Year Leap and The Making of America was to write easily accessible books on the genius of the Founders and their accomplishments.)⁸⁴ NCCS also sells "study courses" on the Constitution, complete with textbooks, quizzes, and lectures on DVD, all designed to increase public knowledge of the Founding Era and to promulgate Skousen's particular views of the Constitution], with earnestness and dedication, often in reading groups modelled on Bible study groups.").

78. ZERNIKE, supra note 8, at 67; Plumer, supra note 15, at 17; Bill Donahue, Tea Party Road Trip: What the Movement Wants—and Why, WASH. POST, Oct. 24, 2010; Mara Liasson, Tea Party: It's Not Just Taxes, It's the Constitution, NPR, July 14, 2010.

79. See, e.g., CODEVILLA, supra note 16, at 88-138 (reprinting the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution); THOMAS E. WOODS, NULLIFICATION: HOW TO RESIST FEDERAL TYRANNY IN THE 21ST CENTURY 267-80 (2010) (Constitution).

80. Plumer, supra note 15, at 16.

81. Cara Kumari, Tea Partiers Tell Lawmakers to Deliver, WSMV-TV television broadcast (Jan. 12, 2011) <http://www.wsmv.com/story/14815383/tea-partiers-tell-lawmakers-to-deliver-1-12-2011>.

82. Plumer, supra note 15, at 16.

83. NATIONAL CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL STUDIES, <http://www.nccs.net/>. First-hand accounts of these seminars can be found in Garrett Epps, Stealing the Constitution, NATION, Feb. 7, 2011, available at <http://www.thenation.com/article/157904/stealing-constitution>; Rosen, Radical Constitutionalism, supra note 28; ZERNIKE, supra note 8, at 64-66; Stephanie Mencimer, One Nation Under Beck, MOTHER JONES (May/June 2010).

84. SKOUSEN, 5000 YEAR LEAP, supra note 34, at iv; SKOUSEN, MAKING OF AMERICA, supra note 29, at 1, 11-12.

Constitution.⁸⁵ PowerThink Publishing, the publisher of Skousen's books, offers a computer disk titled "U.S. Constitution Coach Kit," which includes some 60,000 documents from American history.⁸⁶

NCCS pocket Constitutions are often handed out at Tea Party rallies. On its website, the NCCS urges people to "[g]ive your family and friends a copy of this pocket Constitution and personally invite them to read and study the Constitution."⁸⁷ The NCCS promotes this text of its pocket Constitution as especially authentic, having "been proofed word for word against the original Constitution housed in the Archives in Washington, D.C. It is identical in spelling, capitalization and punctuation."⁸⁸ The front cover has a picture of George Washington, extending a quill to the reader, "inviting each of us to pledge our support for and commitment to The Constitution of the United States by maintaining and promoting its standard of liberty for ourselves and our posterity."⁸⁹ The booklet's back cover includes a pledge, calling on its owner to "affirm that I have read or will read our U.S. Constitution and pledge to maintain and promote its standard of liberty for myself and for my posterity."⁹⁰ The pledge is followed by a line on which one can sign, underneath which is the signature of George Washington, who is identified as the "Witness" to the pledge.⁹¹

This belief that the cause of conservatism can be advanced through family and community-based educational projects extends beyond constitutional education. It has become a central tenet of the modern populist conservative movement. Conservative commentator Mark Levin, in his attack on what he sees as a dominant liberal elite ("Statists," in his terminology), proclaims, "We, the people, are a vast army of educators and communicators."⁹² For Levin, the educational project of reclaiming America starts out with the family: "Parents and grandparents by the millions can counteract the Statist's indoctrination of their children and grandchildren in government

85. Online Store, NATIONAL CENTER FOR CONSTITUTION STUDIES, <http://www.nccsstore.com/American-Government-US-Constitution-Part-1/productinfo/AMGOV1>.

86. POWERTHINK PUBLISHING, <http://www.powerthinkpublishing.com>.

87. NATIONAL CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL STUDIES, http://www.nccs.net/pocket_constitution.html.

88. Id.

89. Id.

90. Id.

91. Id.

92. LEVIN, supra note 43, at 196.

schools and by other Statist institutions simply by conferring their knowledge, beliefs, and ideals on them over the dinner table, in the car, or at bedtime.”⁹³ Glenn Beck and others on the populist Right have been urging parents and grandparents to take over the education of their children.⁹⁴ And beyond the family, one’s community can also be a place in which these lessons are shared. As Levin instructs his readers, “When the occasion arises in conversations with neighbors, friends, coworkers and others, take the time to explain conservative principles and their value to the individual, family and society generally.”⁹⁵

Community and family educational outreach efforts are constitutional mobilization on the most human scale. They do not attract the attention of political campaigns, legislative battles, or judicial opinions. Yet they are critical to the cultivation of a popular constitutional consciousness in potential movement participants. Tea Party activists have promoted the act of sitting down with the text of the Constitution, alone or in small groups, as in and of itself an act of constitutional engagement. Taking up the text is an act of commitment, an act of citizenship. Yet it is also a platform for additional involvement. For many Tea Party leaders, the reading of our founding text is but a springboard to further activism. The engaged citizen should be stirred from a constitutional commitment to involvement in constitutional politics. It is to these political forms of constitutional engagement that I now turn.

III. State-Level Constitutional Mobilization

The second area of Tea Party constitutional activism I will consider has taken place at the state level. It involves, most notably, efforts to get state legislatures to pass resolutions asserting their authority to oppose, perhaps even refuse to enforce, certain federal laws that they deem to be passed in violation of the Constitution. Responding to state-level opposition to health care, these “sovereignty resolutions” or “Tenth Amendment” resolutions have been debated in many states and have actually passed in several. The other state-level strategy involves the effort to mobilize support for

93. Id.

94. See, e.g., <http://mediamatters.org/mmtv/201010040015>; CODEVILLA, supra note 16, at 72 (“The home-school movement, for which the internet became the great facilitator, involves not only each family educating its own children, but also extensive and growing social, intellectual, and spiritual contact among like-minded persons.”).

95. LEVIN, supra note 43, at 196.

various proposed constitutional amendments. Fidelity to basic constitutional principles of limited governance, Tea Party constitutionalists argue, may require changes in the text of the Constitution through the Article V amendment process. Even if none of the Tea Party's proposed amendments are likely to gain the supermajorities in Congress necessary for formal proposal or the state supermajorities necessary for ratification, they provide another valuable platform from which the Tea Party can promote its vision of the Constitution.

A. Tenth Amendment Remedies: Sovereignty Resolutions and Nullification

One of the most controversial elements of the Tea Party's constitutional project has been a revitalization of the idea of states rights and even the possibility of state nullification of federal policy. The logic of state resistance to federal policy, when that policy is believed to be unconstitutional, fits comfortably within the parameters of the Tea Party's larger constitutional project. State-level mobilization is focused primarily on policing the constitutional limits of federal authority. Its advocates reject the idea that the Supreme Court—or any institution of the federal government, for that matter—has final interpretative authority over the meaning of the Constitution.⁹⁶ The textual foundation for the Tea Party's state-level mobilization is the Tenth Amendment, an amendment that has long been used as a rallying cry for small-government activists. (Participants in the contemporary states rights movement often identify themselves as “Tenthers.”)

But the Tea Party's embrace of these state-level projects of resistance to federal policy is significant not only because of the way they align with the movement's constitutional vision, but also because they provide an arena for constitutionally driven political activism that offers near-term, feasible targets and the possibility of occasional victories. These are critical elements for a successful social movement. “We didn't get involved just to scream and shout; we actually have things that we'd like to accomplish,” explained a local Tea Party activist in Tennessee who came to his state's capital to demand that the legislature attend to the Tea Party's concerns.⁹⁷ For citizens in many parts of the nation, the possibility of having their state legislature pass a resolution asserting the value of state sovereignty or a law refusing to implement federal health care policy is a far more realistic goal than the more obvious alternatives, such as convincing Congress to repeal or the Supreme Court to strike down constitutionally suspect laws. Even if these campaigns are often dismissed as merely symbolic, the states nonetheless provide a powerful forum for ongoing popular mobilization of the Tea Party's constitutional agenda.

96. See, e.g., WOODS, supra note 79, at 3 (“The central point behind nullification is that the federal government cannot be permitted to hold a monopoly on constitutional interpretation.”).

The Tea Party's promotion of state-level resistance to federal authority began in a rather haphazard, even farcical manner, but has since developed into a standard element of its larger constitutional project. Texas governor Rick Perry gained headlines when, at a Tea Party rally in the spring of 2009, he went so far as to suggest secession as a possible remedy for an overreaching federal government.⁹⁸ As talk of Texas seceding from the union died down, a basic pattern of Tea Party mobilization in the state legislatures developed. The first step was a round of generic "state sovereignty" resolutions. A popular model resolution has been promoted by the Tenth Amendment Center: The nonbinding "10th Amendment Resolution."⁹⁹ It includes some rather prosaic Tea Partiesque rhetoric—a statement that sovereignty resides in the people, not the government; the text of the Tenth Amendment; a reference to unnamed federal "powers, too numerous to list for the purposes of this resolution" that "infringe on the sovereignty of the people of this state" and may be unconstitutional.¹⁰⁰ It also includes some stronger language—a demand that the federal government "cease and desist any and all activities outside the scope of their constitutionally-delegated powers"; a resolution to form a committee "to recommend and propose legislation which would have the effect of nullifying specific federal laws and regulations"; a call for the creation of a

97. Cara Kumari, Tea Partiers Tell Lawmakers To Deliver, WSMV-TV (Nashville), Jan. 12, 2011, <http://www.wsmv.com/politics/26471655/detail.html>.

98. W. Gardner Selby & Jason Embry, Perry Stands by Secession Comments, STATESMAN.COM, Apr. 17, 2009, <http://www.statesman.com/news/content/region/legislature/stories/04/17/0417gop.html>.

99. 10th Amendment Resolution, TENTH AMENDMENT CENTER, <http://www.tenthamendmentcenter.com/10th-amendment-resolution/>.

100. Id.

“committee of correspondence” to rally support for these principles in other states.¹⁰¹

The next step of the Tea Party’s state-level constitutional project has been the passage of state laws aimed at nullifying specific federal regulatory policies. The primary target here has been the health care law, although federal policies relating to the regulation of guns and medical marijuana have also been challenged through nullification resolutions. Even before passage of the federal health care bill in early 2010, local Tea Party groups were calling upon their state legislatures to take a stand against the looming possibility of a national health care program. A January 2010 rally in Missouri saw numerous state officials expressing support for an amendment to the state constitution prohibiting enforcement of the individual mandate.¹⁰² After the health care bill was signed into law, several states passed statutes expressing opposition to the law; some even went so far as to refuse to enforce the law. Virginia was the first to do so, passing its nullification law on March 4, 2010.¹⁰³ At this time, thirty-six other states were considering similar legislation.¹⁰⁴ These nullification resolutions were based on a template being circulated by the American Legislative Exchange Council (“ALEC”), titled the “Freedom of Choice in Healthcare Act.”¹⁰⁵ By the end of 2010, the model legislation had been introduced or announced in forty-two states; six states (Virginia, Idaho, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, and Missouri), had passed versions of the bill; and two (Arizona and Oklahoma) had passed the bill as a constitutional amendment.¹⁰⁶ In early 2011, Tennessee passed a law that would allow residents to choose to opt out of the health care mandate.¹⁰⁷

101. Id.

102. WOODS, supra note 79, at 122.

103. 2010 Va. Acts ch. 106 (adding § 38.2-3430.1:1 to the Virginia Code) (“No resident of this Commonwealth . . . shall be required to obtain or maintain a policy of individual insurance coverage”); VA. CODE ANN. § 38.2-3430.1:1 (West 2010).

104. Chelsey Ledue, Virginia is the first state to pass national healthcare nullification law, HEALTHCARE FINANCE NEWS, Mar. 5, 2010, <http://www.healthcarefinancenews.com/news/virginia-first-state-pass-national-healthcare-nullification-law>.

105. ALEC’s Freedom of Choice in Health Care Act, AMERICAN LEGISLATIVE EXCHANGE COUNCIL, <http://www.alec.org/AM/Template.cfm?Section=FOCA&Template=/CM/HTMLDisplay.cfm&ContentID=15323>.

106. Id.; see also David Lightman, All Over Map on Health Law, CHI. TRIB., Feb. 22, 2011, at 4.

107. State House Passes Health Freedom Act, CHATTANOOGAN.COM (Mar. 7, 2011), http://www.chattanooga.com/articles/article_196197.asp. The newest state-level tactic being pursued is the creation of an interstate compact that, if it received congressional

When it comes to opposing the constitutionality of federal policy, nullification laws have obvious attractions from a movement mobilization perspective. “Nullification Begins With You,” explains a Tenth Amendment Center brochure designed to promote its “Nullify Now Tour.”¹⁰⁸

Nullification is not something that requires any decision, statement or action from any branch of the federal government. Nullification is not the result of obtaining a favorable court ruling. . . . Nullification is not the petitioning of the federal government to start doing or to stop doing anything. Nullification doesn’t depend on any Federal law being repealed. Nullification does not require permission from any person or institution outside of one’s own State.¹⁰⁹

One of the constant challenges of constitutional mobilization is keeping a sense of purpose and forward momentum to the cause. Constitutional change can be so slow, the realization of constitutional goals often seems impossibly distant. Lobbying state legislatures to stand up for their Tenth Amendment rights has proven a particularly effective way in which the Tea Party addressed this challenge.

B. Article V Remedies: Amending the Constitution

The Tea Party takes seriously the possibility of amending the Constitution. Tea Partiers have rallied around various proposed changes to the Constitution, transforming ideas that had previously only been discussed in isolated conservative circles into issues for public debate. Critics see this as hypocritical. Why would a movement that claims to revere the sanctity of the text of the Constitution and the stability provided by unchanging constitutional principles be so enthusiastic about rewriting certain parts of the document? “[T]he self-proclaimed party of conservatism has become a constitutional graffiti movement,” wrote one skeptic after surveying approval, would exempt member states from participation in the national health care program. See Fred Barnes, Nullifying Obamacare, WEEKLY STANDARD, Jan. 3, 2011, at 16; The Compact, HEALTH CARE COMPACT, <http://www.healthcarecompact.org/compact> (last visited Sept. 20, 2011).

108. Nullifying Federal Mandates Brochure, Tenth Amendment Center, <http://www.tenthamendmentcenter.com/wp-content/uploads/brochures/Nullification-Brochure.pdf>; NULLIFY NOW!, <http://www.nullifynow.com>.

109. Nullifying Federal Mandates Brochure, supra note 108.

the latest round of Tea Party proposed amendments.¹¹⁰ Tea Party supporters defend their call for more serious consideration of the amendment process as outlined in Article V of the Constitution by framing their proposed changes as a part of a project of restoration rather than transformation. As Republican House member Paul Broun of Georgia put it, “We need to do a lot of tweaking to make the Constitution as it was originally intended, instead of some perverse idea of what the Constitution says and does.”¹¹¹ Some of the proposed constitutional revisions, such as repealing the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Amendments (providing, respectively, for a federal income tax and the direct election of senators), are easily justified as in line with the larger Tea Party project of revitalizing lost constitutional principles.¹¹² Tea Party groups have also rallied behind a proposal called the “Repeal Amendment,” which is intended to empower the states so as to, according to its advocates, return the state-federal balance back to its proper constitutional foundations. In this way, Tea Partiers have portrayed their proposed amendments as acts of fidelity to the Constitution of 1787.

As Tea Partiers regularly point to the Progressive Era as the beginning of the end of constitutional governance in the United States, it is perhaps not surprising that they would seek to undo some of the signature constitutional amendments of that period. One target has been the Sixteenth Amendment, which was ratified in 1913 and gave Congress the power to directly tax income. Libertarians have long argued that the most effective way to limit the size of the federal government would be to limit its revenue-raising capacity. Congressman Ron Paul, who has become a kind of godfather of the Tea Party,¹¹³ has long called for repeal of the Sixteenth Amendment,¹¹⁴

110. Robert Schlesinger, The GOP, Tea Party Declare War on the Constitution, USNEWS.COM, Sept. 8, 2010, <http://politics.usnews.com/opinion/articles/2010/09/08/the-gop-tea-party-declare-war-on-the-constitution.html>; see also Timothy Egan, Backward, Into the Future, N.Y. TIMES OPINIONATOR (blog) (June 6, 2010, 8:53 PM), <http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2010/06/06/backward-into-the-future/#more-51533> (“The Constitution is supposed to be second only to the Bible as the sacred text of Tea Party Republicans, but some of them must think it was written in pencil.”).

111. Ben Evans, Republicans Hot, Cold On Constitution, HUFFINGTON POST, Aug. 23, 2010, http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2010/08/23/republicans-hot-cold-on-c_n_690745.html.

112. The movement for repeal of the birthright citizenship provision of the Fourteenth Amendment, which has received considerable support from Tea Party groups, might also be understood along these lines. This issue received a flurry of attention during the summer of 2010, but has since receded from the forefront of the Tea Party agenda.

113. See Joshua Green, The Tea Party's Brain, ATLANTIC, Nov. 2010, at 100.

114. Id.

and his son, Rand Paul, now U.S. Senator from Kentucky, has also called for its repeal.¹¹⁵ “This single change,” Randy Barnett has written about the effort to repeal the income tax power, “would strike at the heart of unlimited federal power and end the costly and intrusive tax code.”¹¹⁶

Another Progressive Era target of the Tea Party is the Seventeenth Amendment, under which members of the Senate are selected through statewide elections rather than being appointed by state legislatures, as required in the Constitution of 1787. Local Tea Party groups were able to elevate this idea, which had previously only lurked around the fringes of the states-rights wing of the conservative movement, into a significant discussion point during the 2010 election cycle.¹¹⁷ Because the Tea Party was a major force, these scattered voices were taken seriously and picked up by more mainstream conservative figures. Conservative commentator Tony Blankley approvingly summarized the basic argument for the repeal of the Seventeenth Amendment: “[T]he best way to revive the 10th Amendment is to repeal the 17th Amendment. . . . The most efficient method of regaining the original constitutional balance is to return to the original constitutional structure. If senators were again selected by state legislatures, the longevity of Senate careers would be tethered to their vigilant defense of their state’s interest—rather than to the interest of Washington forces of influence.”¹¹⁸ Even if this was an utterly unrealistic proposal for amending the Constitution, it offered another opportunity for Tea Partiers and their allies to draw attention to the constitutional developments of the past century, particularly the declining role of the state-level politics and the steady growth of national-level interest groups.

115. RAND PAUL, THE TEA PARTY GOES TO WASHINGTON 231–32 (2011).

116. Barnett, Case for Federalism, supra note 20; see also Randy Barnett & William J. Howell, The Case for a ‘Repeal Amendment’, WALL ST. J., Sept. 16, 2010 (the Sixteenth Amendment “enabled Congress to evade the constitutional limits placed on its own power by effectively bribing states”).

117. Plumer, supra note 15, at 16.

118. Tony Blankley, Repeal the 17th Amendment, RASMUSSEN REPORTS, Jan. 27, 2010, http://www.rasmussenreports.com/public_content/political_commentary/commentary_by_tony_blankley/repeal_the_17th_amendment. A different, more conspiratorial argument has been pursued by The Texas Tea Party: Its “Project 17” is designed to challenge the constitutional status of the Seventeenth Amendment because, the organization claims, it failed to secure the necessary number of states to secure ratification. Project 17, THE TEXAS TEA PARTY, <http://www.texasteaparty.org/project17.html> (last visited Sept. 20, 2011).

The Tea Party has also backed the “Repeal Amendment.” Georgetown law professor Randy Barnett launched this campaign in an opinion piece in the Wall Street Journal in April 2009.¹¹⁹ Barnett proposed what he called a “Federalism Amendment,” which was in fact a collection of changes he thought would resuscitate foundational constitutional principles. Rather than going the traditional Article V route of having Congress propose amendments and then send them to states for ratification, Barnett proposes that the states call a constitutional convention, whose proposals would then require the requisite three-fourths of the states for ratification. The proposal included: Explicitly limiting Congress to its enumerated powers; limiting the reach of the Commerce power by effectively returning Commerce Clause doctrine to its pre-New Deal status (jettisoning the substantial effects and instrumentalities justifications); repealing the Sixteenth Amendment; and requiring that Courts use “original public meaning” to interpret the Constitution.¹²⁰ This was, according to Barnett, “a concrete and practical proposal by which we can restore our lost Constitution.”¹²¹

A month after his Journal piece, Barnett, writing on Forbes.com, expanded his proposal into a “Bill of Federalism”—“10 amendments devised to restore the balance between state and federal power as well as the original meaning of the Constitution.”¹²² They are “primarily designed to reverse Supreme Court rulings that have improperly expanded federal power.”¹²³ Barnett explained that the campaign for a Bill of Federalism would have two primary goals. One was to “become the rallying cry of Tea Parties and other citizen groups across the nation.”¹²⁴ It could “provide an organizing document for candidates seeking state and federal office.”¹²⁵ The other was to change constitutional law. “I fully expect that the Supreme Court would try to forestall its adoption by moving toward the original meaning of the Constitution”¹²⁶

119. Barnett, Case for Federalism, supra note 20.

120. Id.

121. Id.

122. Randy E. Barnett, A Bill of Federalism, FORBES.COM, May 20, 2009, <http://www.forbes.com/2009/05/20/bill-of-federalism-constitution-states-supreme-court-opinions-contributors-randy-barnett.html>.

123. Id.

124. Id.

125. Id.

126. Id. The provisions of the Bill of Federalism include limitations on congressional taxing and commerce power; prohibition of unfunded mandates on states; limits on the Following Barnett's publication of his proposed Federalism Amendment, Tea Party groups in Virginia contacted him and then pressed their state leaders to embrace the proposal.¹²⁷ In September 2010, William J. Howell, speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates, and Barnett coauthored an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal in which they explained and defended a "Repeal Amendment," which would allow a supermajority of states to overturn federal law.¹²⁸ Without this option, Barnett and Howell wrote, the only mechanisms states have to challenge federal law are to either challenge the law in federal court or to attempt to overturn the law through the Article V amendment process. The Repeal Amendment, they argued, offers a more functional way of limiting federal power and protecting basic constitutional principles.¹²⁹ "In short," they conclude, "the amendment provides a new political check on the threat to American liberties posed by a runaway federal government. And checking abuses of power is what the written Constitution is all about."¹³⁰

Following the November 2010 elections, the repeal amendment gained momentum. Virginia Attorney General Kenneth T. Cuccinelli II wrote to state attorneys general around the country urging them to support a constitutional amendment that would allow a supermajority (two-thirds) of the states to overturn federal legislation.¹³¹ By the end of the year, legislative leaders in twelve states had expressed support treaty power; explicit recognition of campaign contributions as protected free speech; a repeal amendment (requiring three-fourths of the states); term limits for members of Congress; a balanced budget amendment; an individual liberty amendment, defined to include, inter alia, "the enjoying, defending and preserving of their life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting real and personal property, making binding contracts of their choosing, and pursuing their happiness and safety" and protected through the due process clause; a requirement that the Constitution be interpreted by a methodology of original meaning. The entire text of the Bill of Federalism can be found at http://www.forbes.com/2009/05/20/bill-of-federalism-constitution-states-supreme-court-opinions-contributors-randy-barnett_2.html.

127. Kate Zernike, Proposed Amendment Would Enable States to Repeal Federal Law, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 20, 2010, at A14.

128. Barnett & Howell, supra note 116. The text of the proposed amendment reads as follows: "Any provision of law or regulation of the United States may be repealed by the several states, and such repeal shall be effective when the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states approve resolutions for this purpose that particularly describe the same provision or provisions of law or regulation to be repealed." Id.

129. Id. Barnett and Howell also differentiate their proposal from nullification: Nullification demands a constitutional justification by the states. Repeal can be based on policy grounds. Id.

130. Id.

131. Zernike, Proposed Amendment, supra note 127.

for the amendment.¹³² In Congress, the repeal amendment was introduced by Representative Bob Bishop of Utah, founder of the House Republican “10th Amendment Task Force”—whose mission is to “[d]isperse power from Washington and restore the Constitutional balance of power through liberty-enhancing federalism.”¹³³ The repeal amendment, Bishop explained, “will provide citizens, through their elected state representatives, with a powerful tool to check an overzealous and power-hungry federal government.”¹³⁴ He went on to say that “it is an arrow in the quiver of states and a solid first step that can be taken to begin restoring the balance of power our Founding Fathers intended when they drafted the Constitution.”¹³⁵ Eric Cantor, the new House Majority Leader, has expressed support as well. The amendment, he said, “would provide a check on the ever-expanding federal government, protect against Congressional overreach, and get the government working for the people again, not the other way around.”¹³⁶

The enthusiasm for amending the Constitution seems to be gaining traction in all corners of movement conservatism, not just among self-identified Tea Party activists. One of the major discussion points of the November 2010 meeting of the Federalist Society was the need for various constitutional amendments.¹³⁷

132. Id. (Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, South Carolina, Texas, Utah, and Virginia).

133. H.R.J. Res. ___, 111th Cong. (2010), available at http://robbishop.house.gov/UploadedFiles/constitutional_amendment.pdf. Earlier in the year, Bishop, along with fellow Utah House member Jason Chaffetz, introduced a bill titled the “Utah Laboratory of Democracy Act of 2010.” It would “exempt the State of Utah from Federal programs in the areas of education, transportation, and Medicaid so that the State of Utah can undertake innovative methods to manage these government programs using Utah’s portion of Federal revenues for these programs, and for other purposes.” H.R. 5238, 111th Cong. (2010), available at http://frwebgate.access.gpo.gov/cgi-bin/getdoc.cgi?dbname=111_cong_bills&docid=f:h5238ih.txt.pdf.

134. Press Release, 10th Amendment Task Force, Rep. Rob Bishop Proposes New Constitutional Amendment (Nov. 30, 2010), available at <http://robbishop.house.gov/10thAmendment/News/DocumentSingle.aspx?DocumentID=215929>.

135. Id.

136. Dana Milbank, A Strange Way to Honor the Founding Fathers, WASH. POST, Dec. 1, 2010, available at <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2010/12/01/AR2010120105576.html>.

137. Robert Barnes, Scholars Debate Whether Time Is Right for Amending the Constitution, WASH. POST, Nov. 28, 2010, available at http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2010/11/28/AR2010112803275.html?wpisrc=nl_fed.

IV. National Electoral Politics

The most widely recognized achievements of the Tea Party movement, at least in its first two years of existence, occurred in the sphere of national electoral politics. The 2010 congressional elections became a critical target for the burgeoning movement. While many critics assumed (or hoped) that the Tea Party would dissipate after the major stimulus bills had been passed and after health care was signed into law, the movement only gained strength through 2010, largely because its activists turned their attention to the upcoming midterm elections. The influence of the Tea Party only seemed to grow as the election process unfolded, from various high-profile Tea Party victories in the Republican primaries through the eventual election of numerous Tea Party-backed candidates to Congress by year's end. Exit polls showed that four out of ten voters in the November 2010 elections expressed support for the Tea Party. Most significantly for purposes of this Article, the movement's focus on the congressional elections provided another forum from which to engage the nation about the Tea Party's constitutional vision. One of the Tea Party's goals was to transform the elections into a debate over the appropriate scope of congressional power under the Constitution.

In terms of advancing its constitutional agenda, the basic Tea Party game plan in the 2010 elections was simple: Insist on making the Constitution a central topic in the election campaigns, force candidates to discuss their constitutional commitments, and refuse to vote for anyone who does not embrace Tea Party constitutional beliefs. So we find a Tea Party-organized candidate forum for a House seat in a district outside of Philadelphia at which candidates were grilled about their views on the Tenth Amendment ("It's my favorite amendment in the Constitution," enthused one hopeful) and the possibility of state nullification of the federal health care requirements.¹³⁸ The most valued label for politicians hoping to gain the support of Tea Party followers is "constitutional conservative." This is what Rand Paul, who embraced the Tea Party all the way to one of Kentucky's Senate seats, likes to call himself;¹³⁹ it was also the label Sarah Palin bestowed upon her favored candidates.¹⁴⁰

138. Kate Zernike, In Power Push, Movement Sees Base in G.O.P., N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 15, 2010, at A1.

139. Paul, supra note 31; PAUL, supra note 115, at ch. 6 (chapter titled "Constitutional Conservatism").

140. See, e.g., Sarah Palin, Competition's Good! Joe Miller for Alaska, FACEBOOK (June 2, 2010, 9:34 AM), http://www.facebook.com/note.php?note_id=395277003434 ("Joe

Sometimes Tea Party faithfuls reduce the label simply to “constitutionalist.”¹⁴¹

“It is becoming apparent to millions of voters the solution lies in electing officials who understand, respect and abide by the Constitution as much as we citizens are expected to follow the law,” explained longtime conservative fundraiser Richard Viguerie.¹⁴² FreedomWorks Chairman Dick Armey’s central basic advice to the newly elected Tea Party-supported members of Congress is quite simple: “Look to the Constitution to govern your policy. You do not swear an oath to the Republican Party or the tea party—your pledge is to defend the Constitution. Let this govern your votes. The Constitution was designed to limit government power, so make sure your votes go only to bills that are right and necessary.”¹⁴³

The Independence Caucus, an organization that describes itself as a “national citizens organization” and has been aligned with local Tea Party groups, has created a lengthy list of yes-or-no “vetting questions” for congressional candidates. It is basically a test of Tea

[Miller] is a true Commonsense Constitutional Conservative”); see also Joseph Boven, Bachmann calls for constitutional conservative takeover to free ‘nation of slaves’, COLO. INDEP. (July, 10, 2010), <http://coloradoindependent.com/57145/bachmann-calls-for-constitutional-conservative-takeover-to-free-nation-of-slaves> (Representative Michelle Bachmann embracing the constitutional conservative label). The most considered use of the label “constitutional conservative” came from a group of leading conservatives, including Reagan Administration Attorney General Edwin Meese, who met in February 2010 and drafted what they called the “Mount Vernon Statement.” The document embraced the theme of constitutional conservatism as the best path for a revitalized right in the twenty-first century:

A Constitutional conservatism unites all conservatives through the natural fusion provided by American principles. It reminds economic conservatives that morality is essential to limited government, social conservatives that unlimited government is a threat to moral self-government, and national security conservatives that energetic but responsible government is the key to America’s safety and leadership role in the world. A Constitutional conservatism based on first principles provides the framework for a consistent and meaningful policy agenda.

Edwin Meese et al., The Mount Vernon Statement, THE MOUNT VERNON STATEMENT (Feb. 17, 2010), <http://www.themountvernonstatement.com/>.

141. See, e.g., ZERNIKE, supra note 8, at 65 (quoting a Tea Party activist proclaiming, “I’m not a Republican anymore. I’m a Constitutionalist.”). This label was also embraced by W. Cleon Skousen. See, e.g., SKOUSEN, 5000 YEAR LEAP, supra note 34, at 337.

142. Richard Viguerie, Constitutionally, the Next Time, WASH. TIMES (Nov. 23, 2009), <http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2009/nov/23/constitutionally-the-next-time>.

143. Dick Armey, Stay True to Principle—And the Constitution, POLITICO, Jan. 18, 2011, <http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0111/47697.html>.

Party bona fides, designed to measure a candidate's commitment to the Independence Caucus' mission of promoting limited government, fiscal responsibility, and "adherence to constitutional authority."¹⁴⁴ The first group of questions focuses on the "proper role of government and national authority," and is prefaced with a statement explaining that all elected public officials take an oath to the Constitution, and that the oath "mandates that all public officials refrain from taking any actions or passing any legislation that is not constitutionally empowered to their elected office."¹⁴⁵ The first question asks whether the candidate agrees that the Tenth Amendment "limits the Federal Government to the 30 enumerated powers that are specified in the Constitution."¹⁴⁶ The second question gives a mini-history of what it characterizes as the flawed constitutional reasoning of Wickard v. Filburn,¹⁴⁷ the 1942 Supreme Court opinion that introduced the substantial effects test into the commerce clause doctrine. The reasoning of Wickard allows for the application of the commerce power to intrastate activity that, when analyzed in the aggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce. It then asks if the candidate agreed to vote against any proposed legislation (and to oppose the "expansion and perpetuation" of existing legislation) that regulates "any areas that are not specifically and expressly enumerated in the Constitution and are therefore reserved as the exclusive province of the states, such as Education, Energy, Welfare, Labor issues, Non-Interstate roads, farm subsidies, etc."—regardless of the Court's holding in Wickard.¹⁴⁸ The questionnaire also asks the candidate to commit to pending legislation that would require each bill to include specific reference to its constitutional basis.¹⁴⁹

The candidate questionnaire created by the Independence Caucus offers a critique of Wickard v. Filburn, but generally treats the

144. Mission Statement, INDEPENDENCE CAUCUS, http://www.icaucus.org/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=51&Itemid=81.

145. The Process: Vetting Questions—Section 1, INDEPENDENCE CAUCUS, http://www.icaucus.org/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=90&Itemid=153 (last visited Sept. 22, 2011).

146. Id.

147. Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942).

148. Vetting Questions—Section 1, supra note 145.

149. Id. The questionnaire also asked if the candidate would commit to oppose any federal grants "not directly related to some power specifically delegated to the Federal Government"—a proposal that "would eliminate upwards of 90% of the Federal-aid programs presently plaguing the nation." Id.

decision as fact—not as a target for reform. When it comes to using the commerce power as defined by the Court, “just because Congress has been allowed to do so, doesn’t mean they should do so. . . .”¹⁵⁰ There is no mention of the candidate’s responsibility to reshape the federal judiciary. Rather, the focus is on constitutionally responsible legislation, regardless of what the Court would allow.

Mike Lee, newly elected U.S. Senator from Utah and a Tea Party favorite, has been quite explicit in talking about the constitutional commitments he, as an elected representative, would feel compelled to follow, regardless of existing judicial doctrine. In a speech to the Federalist Society in November 2010, soon after his election victory, Lee stated, “The solution, I believe, lies not in attempts within the federal judiciary to roll back Wickard v. Fillburn.”¹⁵¹ “Don’t get me wrong,” he went on, “I would love it if that happened. And I applaud those states that have attacked President Obama’s health care plan in the courts”¹⁵² But the solution lies in focusing on the political branches—members of Congress must take more responsibility for the Constitution—they must not forget “the fact that under Article VI, each member of Congress is required to take an oath to uphold the Constitution. In my mind, that means more than doing that which you can get away with in court [M]embers of Congress need to be held accountable, and need to hold themselves accountable, to their oath, regardless of what the courts might be willing to enforce—that needs to become part of the American political discourse.”¹⁵³

In 2009, with the Tea Party movement gaining momentum and seeking to mobilize opposition to the new health care law, Republicans in both houses of Congress introduced the Enumerated Powers Act. It would require all laws to “contain a concise and definite statement of the constitutional authority relied upon for the enactment of each portion of that Act.”¹⁵⁴ A similar proposal was

150. Id.

151. Lee Address, supra note 51.

152. Id.

153. Id.

154. Enumerated Powers Act, H.R. 450, 111th Cong. (2009), available at <http://www.govtrack.us/congress/billtext.xpd?bill=h111-450>. The wording of the Senate bill was slightly different, requiring “a concise explanation of the specific constitutional authority relied upon for the enactment of each portion of that Act.” Enumerated Powers Act, S. 1319, 111th Cong. (2009), available at <http://www.govtrack.us/congress/billtext.xpd?bill=s111-1319>. The House bill was introduced by John Shadegg, Republican from Arizona, and gained seventy cosponsors. H.R. Res. 450. The Senate bill was included in the Independent Caucus' candidate questionnaire.¹⁵⁵ The proposal has clearly resonated with the Tea Party rank and file. A version of it was the top vote-getter for the "Contract From America," an online survey designed as a way in which the Tea Party agenda could be created by a kind of popular referendum process.¹⁵⁶ The proposal, titled "Protect the Constitution," would "[r]equire each bill to identify the specific provision of the Constitution that gives Congress the power to do what the bill does."¹⁵⁷ The proposal was also included in the Republican Pledge to America, which the party rolled out during the 2010 elections.¹⁵⁸ After the 2010 elections, the new Republican-controlled House included this requirement in its new procedural rules. (The new rules also provide that the Constitution be read aloud at the beginning of the new session.¹⁵⁹) This requirement, a Republican press release explained, "will serve to refocus members of Congress, with every bill they introduce, on the Constitution that they take an oath to support and defend."¹⁶⁰ The Republican leadership issued a memorandum about the new requirement to all House members, which included guidelines on introduced by Thomas Coburn, Republican from Arizona, and gained twenty-four co-sponsors. S. 1319.

155. Vetting Questions—Section 1, supra note 145.

156. CONTRACT FROM AMERICA, <http://www.thecontract.org>. The Contract From America was created by Ryan Hecker, an activist affiliated with the Houston Tea Party Society.

157. Id.

158. A Pledge to America: The 2010 Republican Agenda, GOP.GOV, <http://www.gop.gov/pledge> (last visited Sept. 22, 2011) ("We will require each bill moving through Congress to include a clause citing the specific constitutional authority upon which the bill is justified.").

159. H.R. Res. 5, 112th Cong. (as passed by House, Jan. 5, 2011), available at <http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/BILLS-112hres5eh/pdf/BILLS-112hres5eh.pdf>.

160. House Republicans Release Proposed 112th Congress Rules Package, COMMITTEE ON RULES—REPUBLICANS, <http://rules-republicans.house.gov/News/Read.aspx?id=442> (last visited Sept. 22, 2011). See also LEVIN, supra note 43, at 12 (calling on conservatives to "[d]emand that all public servants, elected or appointed, at all times uphold the Constitution and justify their public acts under the Constitution."). An amicus brief signed by Speaker Boehner and forty-four members of the Senate in support of the state lawsuit challenging the health care bill reiterated this point: "Members of Congress are required to swear an oath to uphold the Constitution of the United States. Therefore, they are under an independent responsibility to uphold the Constitution of the United States by ensuring that the Legislative Branch stays within its constitutionally enumerated powers." Brief of Members of the United States Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives John Boehner as Amici Curiae in Support of Plaintiffs-Appellees at 1-2, Florida, et al. v. U.S. Dep't of Health and Human Services, 2011 WL 2530520 (11th Cir. May 20, 2011).

what the new rule would actually require.¹⁶¹ The memorandum included some “illustrative examples of citations to constitution authority,” such as:

The constitutional authority on which this bill rests is the power of Congress to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, as enumerated in Article I, Section 8, Clause 14 of the United States Constitution.¹⁶²

Or, to quote a more Tea Party-esque example:

This bill makes specific changes to existing law in a manner that returns power to the States and to the people, in accordance with Amendment X of the United States Constitution.¹⁶³

Although these were rather spare constitutional justifications, the memorandum indicated that “a sponsor may provide additional explanatory details if they [sic] wish.”¹⁶⁴ The memorandum included suggestions for resources (“in addition to the Constitution itself”) that may be used to assist in the task. They include the Federalist Papers (“considered by many to be the primary source of authority on what the Constitution was understood to mean when it was ratified”); the Annotated Guide to the Constitution produced by the Congressional Research Service and another one produced by the Heritage Foundation;¹⁶⁵ the Founder’s Constitution (a collection of Founding Era documents);¹⁶⁶ and various commentary provided by “a number of think-tanks and associations from across the political spectrum”—the Brookings Institution, the Cato Institute, the Federalist Society, the American Constitution Society.¹⁶⁷

161. Memorandum from Speaker-Designate Boehner, et al., RE: New Constitutional Authority Requirement for Legislation (Dec. 17, 2010), available at <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/politics/pdf/constituional-authority-requirement.html>.

162. Id.

163. Id.

164. Id.

165. THE HERITAGE GUIDE TO THE CONSTITUTION (David F. Forte & Mathew Spalding eds., 2005). “[The] particular aim” of the guide “is to provide lawmakers with a means to defend their role and to fulfill their responsibilities in our constitutional order.” Id. at vii (emphasis added).

166. THE FOUNDERS’ CONSTITUTION (Philip Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 1987), available at <http://press-pubs.uchicago.edu/founders>.

167. Memorandum from Speaker-Designate Boehner, supra note 161.

The memorandum concludes with “Frequently Asked Questions”:

Q. Isn't it the courts' duty to determine whether a law is constitutional and thus doesn't this rule infringe on the power of the courts?

A. No. While the courts have the power to overturn an Act of Congress on the basis that it is unconstitutional, Members of Congress have a responsibility, as clearly indicated by the oath of office each Member takes, to adhere to the Constitution.

Q. What impact will the Constitutional Authority Statement have on litigation regarding the constitutionality of Acts of Congress?

A. To the extent that a court looks at the legislative history of an Act, the Constitutional Authority Statement would be part of that history. However, the courts have made clear that they will not uphold an unconstitutional law simply on the basis that Congress thinks that the law is constitutional.

Q. What if the citation of constitutional authority is inadequate or wrong?

A. As stated earlier, the adequacy and accuracy of the citation of constitutional authority is a matter for debate in the committees and in the House. Ultimately, the House will express its opinion on a proposed bill, including its constitutionality, by either approving or disapproving the bill.

Q. So why have this Rule at all?

A. Just as a cost estimate from the Congressional Budget Office informs the debate on a proposed bill, a statement outlining the power under the Constitution that Congress has to enact a proposed bill will inform and provide the basis for debate. It also demonstrates to the American people that we in Congress understand that we have an obligation under our founding document to stay within the role established therein for the legislative branch.¹⁶⁸

The reason this requirement, that all congressional legislation contain a specific reference to the constitutional basis of authority, gained so much traction has much to do with a moment in the fall of 2009 during the height of the debate over the federal health care bill. At a press conference held by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a reporter from the Cybercast News Service (“CNS”), a conservative news organization, asked the Speaker where in the Constitution she found the basis for the individual mandate provision of the health care bill. Pelosi was dismissive. “Are you serious? Are you serious?” she asked. When the reporter responded in the affirmative, Pelosi shook her head and moved on to another questioner.¹⁶⁹ In response to follow-up inquiry from CNS, Pelosi’s office spokesperson reiterated the Speaker’s point that the constitutional question is “not a serious” question.¹⁷⁰ The Speaker’s office also sent the reporter a copy of a statement posted on the Speaker’s website the previous month that dismissed the constitutional challenge to the health care bill as “nonsensical” and then went on to defend the constitutionality of the legislation under the commerce and taxing power.¹⁷¹ This confrontation, and Pelosi’s dismissive attitude toward the question of the law’s constitutionality, has been referenced again and again in Tea Party literature.¹⁷² It was cited as clear evidence that the Democratic leadership was playing fast and loose with the Constitution, ignoring conservative concerns that health care and other measures pushed beyond the boundaries of Article I’s list of Congress’ enumerated powers.

168. Id.

169. Matt Cover, When Asked Where the Constitution Authorizes Congress to Order Americans To Buy Health Insurance, Pelosi Says: ‘Are You Serious?’, CNSNEWS.COM, Oct. 22, 2009, <http://www.cnsnews.com/node/55971>.

170. Id.

171. Health Insurance Reform Daily Mythbuster: ‘Constitutionality of Health Insurance Reform,’ PR NEWSWIRE, <http://news.prnewswire.com/DisplayReleaseContent.aspx?ACCT=104&STORY=/www/story/09-16-2009/0005095601&EDATE=> (last visited Sept. 21, 2011).

172. See, e.g., WOODS, supra note 79, at 1; CODEVILLA, supra note 16, at 45, 80–81; Ken Klukowski, Letter to the Editor, POLITICO, Oct. 28, 2009, <http://www.politico.com/news/stories/1009/28787.html> (“Yes, Madame Speaker, I’m serious. The individual mandate is unconstitutional. If Obamacare passes, we’ll see you in court.”). Pelosi’s words have become infamous with conservative critics of the health care bill of all stripes, not just those flying the Tea Party banner. See, e.g., Ilya Shapiro, A Long, Strange Trip: My First Year Challenging the Constitutionality of Obamacare, 7 FLA. INT’L. U. L. REV. (forthcoming 2011), available at http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1794562 (recalling “cringing” upon hearing Pelosi’s “Are you serious?” response); Stephen Presser, Is the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act Constitutional? What Should the Supreme Court Do? SCOTUSBLOG (Aug. 8, 2011, 10:21 AM), <http://www.scotusblog.com/2011/08/is-the-patient-protection-and-affordable-care-act-constitutional-what-should-the-supreme-court-do> (“Most elite legal academic opinion treats the argument that the individual mandate is constitutionally flawed with something approaching the contempt displayed by former Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, whose response to doubters about the Act’s Constitutionality was simply to say ‘Are you serious?’”).

The House Tea Party Caucus has begun a high-profile Constitution study group, not unlike the ones that have popped up around the nation with the encouragement of local Tea Party groups. Michelle Bachmann, U.S. Representative from Minnesota and founder of the Tea Party Caucus, organized a series of what she called “Conservative Constitutional Seminars” for members of Congress.¹⁷³ “Every week we’ll start our week with a class on the Constitution and how maybe bills that we’re working on fit in with the Constitution—real time application.”¹⁷⁴ “We’re going to do what the NFL does and what the baseball teams do,” she explained. “[W]e’re going to practice every week, if you will, our craft, which is studying and learning the Declaration, the Constitution, and the Bill of Rights.”¹⁷⁵ The class became a major news story before it even began, when Bachmann announced that Justice Scalia would lead the group’s first meeting.¹⁷⁶

There was also the highly publicized reading of the Constitution from the floor of the House of Representatives at the start of the term of the 112th Congress—the first time this had ever been done in the history of the House. Republican Congressman Bob Goodlatte of Virginia, a fiscal conservative and staunch opponent of the health care bill,¹⁷⁷ initiated the idea. “One of the resounding themes I have heard from my constituents is that Congress should adhere to the Constitution and the finite list of powers it granted to the federal

173. Justice Scalia to Address Conservative Constitutional Seminar, CONGRESSWOMAN MICHELE BACHMANN, NEWS, Dec. 15, 2010, <http://bachmann.house.gov/News/DocumentSingle.aspx?DocumentID=217599>; Gabriella Schwarz, Congress to be Schooled, CNN.COM, Dec. 15, 2010, <http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2010/12/15/congress-to-be-schooled-2/#more-139906>.

174. Gingrich, Bachmann Speak to Brody File About New GOP Congress, THE BRODY FILE, CBN.COM (Dec. 9, 2010, 11:51 AM), <http://blogs.cbn.com/thebrodyfile/archive/2010/12/09/gingrich-bachmann-speak-to-brody-file-about-new-gop-congress.aspx>.

175. Kyle Mantyla, Scalia To Teach Bachmann’s Inaugural Class On The Constitution, RIGHT WING WATCH (Dec. 13, 2010, 6:13 PM), <http://www.rightwingwatch.org/content/scalia-teach-bachmanns-inaugural-class-constitution>.

176. Id.; Justice Scalia and the Tea Party, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 19, 2010, at WK7. On January 24, Scalia talked at the seminar. According to reports of some who attended, Scalia gave his trademark defense of originalism and urged the lawmakers to read the Federalist Papers and to follow the Constitution as it was written. David G. Savage & Kathleen B. Hennessey, Scalia Gives Talk on Constitution to Members of House, CHI. TRIBUNE, Jan. 25, 2011, at 12.

177. “All Americans should be worried anytime the federal government tries to trample on or ignore our Constitution . . .,” Goodlatte wrote in defending his opposition to the health care bill. Bob Goodlatte, The Wrong Prescription for America, CONGRESSMAN BOB GOODLATTE (Mar. 26, 2010), <http://goodlatte.house.gov/2010/03/the-wrong-prescription-for-america.shtml>.

government,” he said in a press release. “As the written expression of the consent the American people gave to their government—a consent with restrictions and boundaries—the public reading of the Constitution will set the tone for the 112th Congress.”¹⁷⁸ “Call it the tea party-ization of Congress,” wrote Washington Post reporters about the newfound congressional fascination with the Constitution.¹⁷⁹ “After handing out pocket-size Constitutions at rallies, after studying the document article by article and after demanding that Washington return to its founding principles, tea party activists have something new to applaud. A pillar of their grass-roots movement will become a staple in the bureaucracy that governs Congress.”¹⁸⁰

The Tea Party has created a constitutional agenda that does not simply provide a collection of principles that might be attractive to certain segments of the population, but also provides ways in which citizens can take part in a constitutional movement. This is a constitutional project around which a social movement can mobilize. Mike Lee and others in the Tea Party movement recognize that constitutional litigation is far harder to use as a tool of social mobilization—it is slow, it is detached from the people themselves, and it is dependent on a small number of individuals who are only indirectly accountable to democratic inputs. By turning to congressional elections and lawmaking as an arena of constitutional contestation, the Tea Party has found a way in which everyday citizens can stake out constitutional claims and then demand, in a relatively direct manner, that government abide by these constitutional principles. This approach to constitutionalism is far more empowering and far more effective as a tool of movement mobilization, than working through the courts.

V. The Future of Tea Party Constitutionalism

An assessment of the impact of the Tea Party’s constitutional project can be divided into two areas of possible influence: the development of constitutional law in the courts; and the role of the Constitution outside the courts.

178. Press Release, Congressman Bob Goodlatte, Goodlatte to Lead Historic Reading of U.S. Constitution on House Floor (Jan. 4, 2011), available at <http://goodlatte.house.gov/2011/01/goodlatte-to-lead-historic-reading-of-us-constitution-on-house-floor.shtml>.

179. Philip Rucker & Krissah Thompson, Two New Rules will Give Constitution a Starring Role in GOP-Controlled House, WASH. POST, Dec. 30, 2010.

180. Id.

A. Constitutional Law

While the central target of the Tea Party constitutional movement has been the political process and, more generally, popular attitudes toward the Constitution, there have been clear signs that the Tea Party's influence is being felt in the judiciary as well. Nowhere is this more evident than in litigation challenging the constitutionality of the federal health care law.

Of the many issues around which the Tea Party has mobilized over the past two years, none has been so effective a rallying cry as opposition to the health care law that President Obama signed into law on March 23, 2010.¹⁸¹ On this matter, the Tea Party, a diverse and unwieldy coalition of agendas on its best of days, speaks with a marked singularity of purpose. From the time the Obama administration first proposed a national health care program, Tea Party loyalists challenged it not only as a policy matter, but also as an unconstitutional extension of federal power. In its effort to establish a national health care program, particularly the requirement included in the final version of the bill that individual citizens must carry health insurance, Tea Partiers have argued that Congress has gone beyond its constitutionally enumerated powers, as defined in Article I of the Constitution. The Tea Party case against the health care law also regularly references two other constitutional values dear to the hearts of Tea Partiers, which the health care law violates: state sovereignty and individual liberty.

Today none of these constitutional claims are limited to the Tea Party. They have become mainstream tenets of Republican opposition to the health care bill. It is worth considering how this happened—how a fringe constitutional claim, at first limited to Tea Party and libertarian true believers, became mainstream. At the time of its passage, Republicans framed their opposition primarily on policy grounds. While constitutional objections were in the air, they were a distinctly minor strain.¹⁸²

181. Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, Pub. L. No. 111-148, 124 Stat. 119 (2010).

182. Early articulations of the constitutional challenge include: Orrin Hatch, Letter to editor: 'Unconstitutional', POLITICO, Nov. 9, 2009, <http://www.politico.com/news/stories/1109/29302.html>; David B. Rivkin Jr. & Lee A. Casey, Mandatory Insurance Is Unconstitutional, WALL ST. J., Sept. 18, 2009; David B. Rivkin Jr. & Lee A. Casey, Constitutionality of Health Insurance Mandate Questioned, WASH. POST, Aug. 22, 2009. Minnesota governor Tim Pawlenty created a brief flurry of controversy in September 2009 when he suggested that states might, based on the Tenth Amendment, block implementation of the health care bill. Tom Scheck, Amid criticism, Pawlenty backtracks

During deliberation of the bill, the prevailing assumption on the constitutional question, reflected in Speaker Pelosi's dismissive non-response to the reporter's question on the issue, was that the constitutional basis for the law was simply not a real issue. The Washington Post's Charles Lane wrote an entry on the newspaper's blog under the title "Is health reform unconstitutional? Don't laugh." Lane allowed that the chance of a successful legal challenge to health care was "a long shot," but then went on to advance what he portrayed as the contrarian argument, concluding that it was not "a total laugher."¹⁸³ On the left, constitutional concerns with the health care law were generally described as the province of fringe libertarians. "Pelosi is right to be dismissive of the fringe right-wing theory behind this question, which has no basis in the Constitution itself," wrote Ian Millhiser of the liberal blog ThinkProgress.¹⁸⁴ Writing in American Prospect, Yale Law Professor Jack Balkin offered a hypothetical scenario in which the Court struck down the pending health legislation on constitutional grounds, while assuring his readers in definitive terms that the Court "will not" ever do so.¹⁸⁵ The constitutional challenges reside in the "realm of fantasy," wrote Linda Greenhouse, ex-Supreme Court reporter for the New York Times, now teaching at Yale Law School.¹⁸⁶ They raise "[i]nteresting theoretical questions, to be sure," but when it comes to actually getting a majority of the justices to agree with them, "[t]he answer, almost certainly, is no."¹⁸⁷ Erwin Chemerinsky, Dean of the from state's rights comment, MPRNEWS.COM, Sept. 11, 2009, <http://minnesota.publicradio.org/display/web/2009/09/11/pawlenty-tenth-amendment>. Pawlenty quickly retracted his statement, and in an subsequent interview he carefully distinguished his policy-based concerns from constitutional issues: "[I]n the legal sense, I think the courts have addressed these Tenth Amendment issues, but more in the political sense, in the common sense arena, we need to have a clear understanding of what the federal government does well and what should be reserved to the states." Pawlenty Backs Off Nullification, ABCNews.com (Sept. 13, 2009), <http://blogs.abcnews.com/george/2009/09/pawlenty-backs-off-nullification.html>. The governor said he was not considering a potential lawsuit to the bill if it passed. Scheck, supra note 182.

183. Charles Lane, Is health reform unconstitutional? Don't laugh, POST PARTISAN, WASH. POST (blog) (Mar. 24, 2010, 5:14 PM), http://voices.washingtonpost.com/postpartisan/2010/03/is_health_reform_unconstitutio.html.

184. Ian Millhiser, Pelosi Dismisses Tenth Reporter: 'Are You Serious?', THINKPROGRESS (Oct. 23, 2009, 1:40 PM), <http://thinkprogress.org/2009/10/23/pelosi-serious>.

185. Jack M. Balkin, What to Do About the Court? AM. PROSPECT, Oct. 1, 2009.

186. Linda Greenhouse, Which Side of History? N.Y. TIMES OPINIONATOR (Mar. 25, 2010, 9:20 PM), <http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2010/03/25/which-side-of-history>.

187. Id.

University of California, Irvine, School of Law, wrote a widely cited defense of the health care bill on constitutional grounds. “Those who object to the health care proposals on constitutional grounds are making an argument that has no basis in the law,” Chemerinsky wrote. “They are invoking the rhetorical power of the Constitution to support their opposition to health care reform, but the law is clear that Congress constitutionally has the power to do so. There is much to argue about in the debate over health care reform, but constitutionality is not among the hard questions to consider.”¹⁸⁸ Chemerinsky’s argument, along with those of several other legal scholars, were cited by Senator Max Baucus on the floor of the Senate as the bill moved toward passage.¹⁸⁹

In the months following passage, with the Tea Party movement in full effect, these confident assumptions soon dissipated. The Tea Party insisted that the law was fatally flawed not only as a matter of policy but also as a matter of constitutional principle. And, in a matter of months, their constitutionally based argument became a centerpiece of the Republican Party’s opposition to the law. Quite simply, the Tea Party made the Constitution a central part of the health care debate.

Although the Tea Party’s constitutional arguments against the health care bill have been targeted predominantly at mobilizing popular opposition to the law and pressuring state and federal elected representatives to oppose it, the movement’s impact appears to have been felt in the courts as well. The Tea Party’s success in making its constitutional arguments a central component of opposition to health care has likely influenced the various court-based challenges to health care that are currently proceeding through the federal judiciary and are almost surely heading to the Supreme Court. When the law was passed, only a relatively small (if vocal) minority of legal scholars thought the constitutional objections to health care would be seriously entertained by the courts. The near consensus position of constitutional experts, repeated throughout the mainstream media, was that the courts would never step in to overturn the law on constitutional grounds. But as the Tea Party effectively energized opposition to the health care law in the lead-up to the 2010 elections, all the time insisting that the constitutional concerns of its members be taken seriously, these predictions gradually became less confident. (Although polling has shown a divided county on attitudes toward the health care bill as whole and mixed attitudes on particular provisions, overwhelming majorities oppose the individual mandate.)¹⁹⁰ Even before federal judges began striking down the individual mandate provision of the law, the press and legal scholars had started to qualify their predictions of what the courts were going to do with the health care challenges.¹⁹¹

188. Erwin Chemerinsky, Health Care Reform is Constitutional, POLITICO (Oct. 23, 2009), <http://www.politico.com/news/stories/1009/28620.html>; see also Mark A. Hall, Commerce Clause Challenges to Health Care Reform, 159 U. PA. L. REV. (forthcoming 2011).

189. Press Release, The United States Senate Committee on Finance, Floor Statement of Senator Max Baucus (D-Mont.) Regarding the Constitutionality of Health Care Reform (Dec. 22, 2009), available at <http://finance.senate.gov/newsroom/chairman/release/?id=21832ee9-6731-4fdf-858a-871375258c33> (“Most legal scholars who have considered the question of a requirement for individuals to purchase health coverage argue forcefully that the requirement is within Congress’ power to regulate interstate commerce.”).

Although it would be much too simplistic to say that Tea Party activism and its success in the 2010 elections will change the way the Supreme Court is likely to rule on the health care legislation, public opinion does play a role in creating the conditions that are required to make such a holding even a possibility. Recent history has shown that a certain baseline of popular support—as expressed in opinion polls, in election returns, as well as in social movement activism—is a necessary, if not sufficient, condition for a Supreme Court to strike down a major act of Congress. Simply put, even when there are legally viable arguments¹⁹² for holding a law unconstitutional, the Supreme Court is highly unlikely to do so when the law retains significant political and popular support following its passage. At the time of passage of the health care bill, most assumed that support for the program would only grow in the coming months and years. This did not happen. While opinion polls have found support for individual provisions of the Affordable Care Act, the law as a whole

190. The Associated Press-National Constitution Center Poll (Aug. 11-16, 2010), <http://surveys.ap.org/data/GfK/AP-GfK%20Poll%20August%20NCC%20topline.pdf>.

191. For a particularly self-reflective appraisal of this development, compare Michael C. Dorf, The Constitutionality of Health Insurance Reform, Part II: Congressional Power, FINDLAW, Nov. 2, 2009, <http://writ.news.findlaw.com/dorf/20091102.html> (dismissing the constitutional objection to the health care bill as “unsound as a matter of constitutional law”) with Mike Dorf, Tribe, the Health Care Mandate, and Legal Realism, DORFONLAW (Feb. 9, 2011, 12:16 AM), <http://www.dorfonlaw.org/2011/02/tribe-health-care-mandate-and-legal.html> (reassessing earlier argument and now concluding that the constitutional objections to the law “is not completely off the wall” and that he is “no longer confident that the case will be a slam dunk in the Supreme Court.”).

192. By which I simply mean arguments that draw on the traditional, generally accepted, basic tools of constitutional analysis: text, history, and precedent.

has failed to garner the kind of widespread acceptance its proponents had hoped and expected. This fact, a product of political (and constitutional) mobilization rather than lawyerly constitutional analysis, has made the health care law far more vulnerable to a constitutional challenge in the courts.

The basic claim that the modern Supreme Court rarely stands in the way of popular acts of national legislation has been well developed in the political science literature and has recently become quite prominent in the legal academy. As Barry Friedman writes in The Will of the People, one of the most prominent articulations of this argument that the Court is basically a majoritarian institution, following the Supreme Court's failed effort in the 1930s to block major pieces of the New Deal, the Court and the citizenry made a "tacit deal": "[T]he American people would grant the justices their power, so long as the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Constitution did not stray too far from what a majority of the people believed it should be. For the most part, this deal has stuck."¹⁹³ While the Tea Party's vision of the Constitution generally does not have the kind of majority support that Friedman describes, it has received attention beyond its polling numbers because it has been attached to such a vibrant—and often controversial—social movement.¹⁹⁴ Tea Party leaders recognize this dynamic relationship between extrajudicial constitutional mobilization and judicial doctrine. Matt Kibbe, president of FreedomWorks, has said that "courts look at public opinion, and on health care the courts are going to consider what the American people and the existing Congress think, although they may not admit it."¹⁹⁵ One commentator described Virginia's legal brief submitted in support of its challenge to the law as "both a court pleading and a Tea Party manifesto about an overreaching federal government."¹⁹⁶ Jeffrey Rosen concluded, "[T]he constitutional arguments that Congress lacks the power to pass health care reform, which seemed far-fetched only a year ago, are

193. BARRY FRIEDMAN, THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE: HOW PUBLIC OPINION HAS INFLUENCED THE SUPREME COURT AND SHAPED THE MEANING OF THE CONSTITUTION 4 (2009).

194. See, e.g., Siegel, supra note 42, at 312–13 ("Claims on the text of the Constitution made by mobilized groups of Americans outside the courthouse helped bring into being the understandings that judges then read into the text of the Constitution.").

195. Rosen, supra note 28.

196. Dahlia Lithwick, Dream a Little Dream: Why the Cuccinelli health care win in Virginia matters more than you think, SLATE (Dec. 13, 2010), <http://www.slate.com/id/2277782>.

more likely to gain traction in the courts now that the arguments are being resurrected in Congress and among the Tea Party faithful.”¹⁹⁷

Early indications of the possible influence of the Tea Party movement on the courts can be seen in the conspicuous successes challengers to the health care law have had in the lower federal courts. At the time this article goes to print, two federal district courts and a court of appeals have declared unconstitutional the law’s individual mandate provision,¹⁹⁸ and another court of appeals ruling that upheld the law produced a dissenting opinion.¹⁹⁹ (Three district courts²⁰⁰ have upheld the law and several others have dismissed challenges without deciding on the merits.)²⁰¹ It is impossible to say that these judges would have decided the cases differently in the absence of a politically powerful movement that was dedicated to convincing the nation that this law was indeed unconstitutional. But it seems safe to say that the Tea Party made it easier for conservative judges to strike down the mandate. The mandate could readily be defined as an unprecedented expansion of federal power,²⁰² and

197. Rosen, supra note 28.

198. Florida v. U.S. Dep’t of Health & Human Serv, No. 3:10-cv-91-RV/EMT, 2011 WL 285683 (N.D. Fla. Jan. 31, 2011); Virginia v. Sebelius, 728 F. Supp. 2d 768 (E.D. Va., 2010).

199. Thomas More Law Center v. Obama, No. 10-2388, 2011 WL 2556039 (6th Cir. June 29, 2011) (Graham, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

200. Thomas More Law Center v. Obama, 720 F. Supp. 2d 882 (E.D. Mich. 2010).

201. See Bara Vaida & Karl Eisenhower, Scoreboard: Tracking Health Law Court Challenges, KAISER HEALTH NEWS (Sep. 13, 2011), <http://www.kaiserhealthnews.org/Stories/2011/March/02/health-reform-law-court-case-status.aspx>.

202. The crux of the constitutional debate over the individual mandate is as follows: Critics contend that the requirement that individuals purchase health insurance is a novel venture for the federal government, being the first time Congress has drawn on its power to regulate commerce in order to compel an activity by a private actor. See, e.g., Florida v. U.S. Dep’t Health & Human Serv., 2011 WL 285683, at *20 (discussing Congressional Research Service and Congressional Budget Office reports concluding that the individual mandate was a “novel” and “unprecedented” exercise of congressional power). Critics further argue that the commerce power extends only to the regulation of economic activity, and that the choice of remaining uninsured is, in fact, the absence of activity. See, e.g., id. at 22 (“It would be a radical departure from existing case law to hold that Congress can regulate inactivity under the Commerce Clause.”). In contrast, those who would locate congressional authority for the individual mandate in the commerce power contend that the distinction between activity and inactivity in this context is illusory. The decision not to buy health insurance, they argue, is an economic activity. See, e.g., Thomas More Law Center v. Obama, 2011 WL 2556039, at *11 (“activity of foregoing health insurance and attempting to cover the cost of health care needs by self-insuring is no less economic than the activity of purchasing an insurance plan. Thus, the financing of health care services, and specifically the practice of self-insuring, is economic activity.”); id. at 23 (“[T]he text of the Commerce Clause does not acknowledge a constitutional distinction therefore the question of its constitutionality could be understood as a legal issue on which there was no controlling precedent. In such a situation, where traditional techniques of legal analysis do not compel a particular result, political or ideological inclinations are likely to be determinative.²⁰³

On December 13, 2010, Judge Henry E. Hudson of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia became the first federal judge to strike down part of the health care law when he struck down the individual mandate provision as outside the scope of congressional commerce or taxing power.²⁰⁴ “At its core,” Hudson wrote, “this dispute is not simply about regulating the business of insurance—or crafting a scheme of universal health insurance coverage—it’s about an individual’s right to choose to participate.”²⁰⁵ “[T]his lawsuit is not about health care. It is about liberty” proclaimed Virginia Attorney General Ken Cuccinelli, who argued the case, after Judge Hudson announced his decision. “This ruling is extremely positive for anyone who believes in the system of federalism created by our Founding Fathers.”²⁰⁶ In praising the decision, the Wall Street Journal editors noted that because of it “Liberals may be forced to take ObamaCare opponents seriously between activity and inactivity, and neither does the Supreme Court. Furthermore, far from regulating inactivity, the provision regulates active participation in the health care market.”).

203. Michael Klarman has presented this basic descriptive claim in its simplest form: “When the law is clear, judges will generally follow it, unless they have very strong personal preferences to the contrary. When the law is indeterminate, judges have little choice but to make decisions based on political factors.” MICHAEL J. KLARMAN, FROM JIM CROW TO CIVIL RIGHTS: THE SUPREME COURT AND THE STRUGGLE FOR RACIAL EQUALITY 5 (2004). For an application of this kind of reasoning to the health care challenge, see Stuart Taylor, Health Care Lawsuits and Party-Line Judging, KAISER HEALTH NEWS (Dec. 6, 2010), <http://www.kaiserhealthnews.org/Columns/2010/December/120610stuarttaylor.aspx> (“With no clear guidance from the precedents, the outcome is likely to turn less on legalities than on the justices’ views of whether the new law is good or bad for the country and whether . . . they should second-guess the elected branches on the most important new legislation in decades. The latter calculation might well turn partly on how striking down the new health care law would play in Peoria. If majorities of the public and Congress are clamoring for repeal when the justices are mulling the issue—probably in 2012 or 2013—the conservatives could strike it down without fear of a big public backlash.”); Lithwick, supra note 196 (“This is not really a constitutional debate; it’s about policy preferences . . .”).

204. Cuccinelli v. Sebelius, 702 F. Supp. 2d 598 (E.D. Va. 2010).

205. Press Release, Kenneth T. Cuccinelli II, Virginia wins federal court challenge over constitutionality of federal health care act: Health insurance mandate is unconstitutional (Dec. 13, 2010), http://www.oag.state.va.us/Media%20and%20News%20Releases/News_Releases/Cuccinelli/121310_HealthCare_Ruling.html.

206. Id.

after all.”²⁰⁷ The speed with which accepted wisdom on the possibility that the courts could kill the health care bill shifted was notable. According to the New York Times reporter covering the health care challenges, writing as the Virginia case was nearing its end, “That this stage in the legal assault on the health law has arrived so quickly is striking, given that many prominent law professors dismissed the challenges as baseless only seven months ago, when the first of more than 15 lawsuits were filed.”²⁰⁸

Then, on January 31, 2011, in a U.S. District Court in Florida, Judge Roger Vinson issued his own decision striking down the individual mandate as beyond Congress’ commerce power.²⁰⁹ Judge Vinson went one step further than Judge Hudson, however, and ruled that the individual mandate could not be severed from the rest of the law and therefore the entire law is unconstitutional. The case Judge Vinson heard involved twenty-six states that had joined a constitutional challenge to the health care bill launched by Florida Attorney General Bill McCullom.²¹⁰ From the start of the trial, Judge Vinson expressed considerable sympathy for the arguments of the challenges to the health care law.²¹¹ “It would be a giant leap for the Supreme Court to say that a decision to buy or not to buy is tantamount to activity,” Vinson announced during the trial.²¹² Thus it was hardly a surprise when he ruled as he did.

Vinson’s opinion was notable not only for the sweeping holding, but also for the sharply critical tone he took toward the law and the government’s defense of it.²¹³ One commentator described the

207. Editorial, Yes, Virginia . . . : ObamaCare is Unconstitutional, WALL ST. J., Aug. 3, 2010, at A16.

208. Kevin Sack, Ruling on Health Law Is Due by End of Year, N.Y. TIMES, Oct. 19, 2010, at A16; see also Kevin Sack, Core of Health Care Law is Rejected by a U.S. Judge, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 14, 2010, at A1 (“[T]he ruling was . . . striking given that only nine months ago, prominent law professors were dismissing the constitutional claims as just north of frivolous.”).

209. Florida v. U.S. Dep’t of Health & Human Serv., No. 3:10-cv-91-RV/EMT, 2011 WL 285683 (N.D. Fla. Jan. 31, 2011).

210. The partisan divide on the issue is readily apparent: All but one of the attorneys general who have joined the lawsuit is Republican. Louisiana’s attorney general is the only Democrat to join. In addition to the twenty-six states, the suit was also joined by two private citizens and the National Federation of Independent Business.

211. Janet Adamy, Judge Leery of Health Mandate, WALL ST. J., Dec. 17, 2010, <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052748703395204576023733405954012.html>.

212. Id.

213. See, e.g., Noam N. Levey & David G. Savage, Judge Strikes Down Health Care Law; Florida Jurist Cites Boston Tea Party in Ruling, CHI. TRIB., Feb. 1, 2011, at 12 (characterizing Vinson’s opinion as “stinging”).

opinion as a “Tea Party Manifesto.”²¹⁴ The stakes could not be higher, Judge Vinson explained. The case “is not really about our health care system at all. It is principally about our federalist system, and it raises very important issues regarding the Constitutional role of the federal government.”²¹⁵ He then cycled through representative touchstones of Tea Party constitutionalism, including Madison’s Federalist 45 (“The powers delegated . . . to the federal government are few and defined.”) and the Tenth Amendment.²¹⁶ He offered a lengthy and heavily originalist account of the evolution of the commerce power, in which he made little effort to hide his sympathy for a far more restrictive interpretation. “[F]or most of the first century and a half of Constitutional government . . . the Clause was narrowly construed. . . . But, everything changed in 1937”²¹⁷ Judge Vinson even seemed to tap into the Tea Party-inspired vogue for revolutionary history: “It is difficult to imagine that a nation which began, at least in part, as the result of opposition to a British mandate giving the East India Company a monopoly and imposing a nominal tax on all tea sold in America would have set out to create a government with the power to force people to buy tea in the first place.”²¹⁸ “Surely this is not what the Founding Fathers could have intended,” he concluded about the idea that Congress could require individuals to purchase health insurance. To allow Congress to extend its reach this far would leave us with “a Constitution in name only.”²¹⁹

At the time this article goes to print, two federal courts of appeals have weighed in on the constitutionality of the health care law, with a third due to do so in the near future. In May 2011, the Fourth Circuit heard oral arguments in an appeal of the Virginia case,

214. Mark Hall, Judge Vinson’s Tea Party Manifesto, HEALTH REFORM WATCH, Jan. 31, 2011, <http://www.healthreformwatch.com/2011/01/31/judge-vinsons-tea-party-manifesto>; see also Timothy Jost, Analyzing Judge Vinson’s Opinion Invalidating The ACA, HEALTH AFFAIRS BLOG (Feb. 1, 2011, 3:57 PM), <http://healthaffairs.org/blog/2011/02/01/analyzing-judge-vinsons-opinion-invalidating-the-aca> (“This is a radical decision. Judge Vinson has a clear vision of the limited federal government the founders intended that is very much in line with that espoused by the Tea Party Movement.”).

215. Florida v. U.S. Dep’t of Health & Human Serv., No. 3:10-cv-91-RV/EMT, 2011 WL 285683, at *1 (N.D. Fla. Jan. 31, 2011).

216. Id.

217. Id. at *15–*16.

218. Id. at *22.

219. Id.

which was consolidated with another challenge,²²⁰ and is expected to release a decision sometime in the late summer or fall.²²¹ The Sixth Circuit was the first appellate court to issue a ruling on the issue. In June 2011, a three-judge panel issued a divided ruling that upheld the individual mandate provision and affirmed a ruling from of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan.²²² In news accounts, one of the most notable aspects of the ruling was the concurring decision of Judge Jeffrey Sutton, who is generally recognized as a conservative (he clerked for Justice Scalia, was appointed to the bench by President George W. Bush, and was confirmed by the Senate in a divided, party-line vote).²²³ The lead plaintiffs in this case, the Thomas More Law Center, a Christian legal advocacy group, have filed a petition for certiorari at the Supreme Court.²²⁴

In August 2011, the Fourth Circuit, also in a divided opinion, upheld Judge Vinson's ruling regarding the individual mandate while rejecting his conclusion that the voiding of this provision required the striking down of the entire law. The mandate is "breathtaking in its

220. Liberty Univ., Inc. v. Geithner, 753 F. Supp. 2d 611 (W.D. Va. 2010) (granting defendant's motion to dismiss).

221. Lyle Denniston, Easy Outing for Health Care Law?, SCOTUSBLOG (May 10, 2011, 5:34 PM), <http://www.scotusblog.com/2011/05/easy-outing-for-health-care-law>. The sense of those who reported on oral arguments at the Fourth Circuit was that the panel was not particularly sympathetic to those challenging the law. See, e.g., id.; Janet Adams, Judges Test Health Law's Foes, WALL ST. J., May 11, 2011.

222. Thomas More Law Center v. Obama, No. 10-2388, 2011 WL 2556039 (6th Cir. June 29, 2011), affirming 720 F. Supp. 2d 882 (E.D. Mich. 2010).

223. See, e.g., Jess Bravin, Appeals Court Says Health Law Is Constitutional, WALL ST. J. ONLINE, (June 30, 2011), available at <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052702304584004576415803689791070.html>. Judge Sutton did not hide his personal skepticism toward the health care law. He wrote sympathetically, for example, of "the lingering intuition—shared by most Americans, I suspect—that Congress should not be able to compel citizens to buy products they do not want." Thomas More Law Center v. Obama, 2011 WL 2556039, at *32 (Sutton, J., concurring in part and delivering the opinion of the court in part). And he ended his opinion with a reference to the "stirring" national debate over the law and his hopes for a "political resolution." Id. at *33. Nonetheless, Sutton concluded: "Not every intrusive law is an unconstitutionally intrusive law. And even the most powerful intuition about the meaning of the Constitution must be matched with a textual and enforceable theory of constitutional limits, and the activity/inactivity dichotomy does not work with respect to health insurance in many settings, if any of them." Id. at *32. Thus, "the peoples' political representatives, rather than their judges," should have the final word. Id. at *33.

224. Petition for Writ of Certiorari, Thomas More Law Center v. Obama (No. 11-117) available at <http://sblog.s3.amazonaws.com/wp-content/uploads/2011/08/Petition-11-117.pdf>.

expansive scope,” the Court concluded.²²⁵ “The government’s position amounts to an argument that the mere fact of an individual’s existence substantially affects interstate commerce, and therefore Congress may regulate them at every point of their life. This theory affords no limiting principles in which to confine Congress’s enumerated power.” While not adopting the Tea Party-inspired rhetoric found in Judge Vinson’s opinion, the court does offer ominous warnings of the threat posed by the health care law. “The federal government’s assertion of power, under the Commerce Clause, to issue an economic mandate for Americans to purchase insurance from a private company for the entire duration of their lives is unprecedented, lacks cognizable limits, and imperils our federalist structure.”²²⁶

Today, in the wake of these two district court decisions striking down the individual mandate provision, the new conventional wisdom is that there is a serious constitutional question at issue and it is not clear what the ultimate resolution is going to be in the Supreme Court.²²⁷ As Randy Barnett has written, “if the Court views the Act as manifestly unpopular, there may well be five Justices who are open to valid constitutional objections they might otherwise resist.”²²⁸ The Tea Party’s impact can be seen on the public’s expectation of the judiciary—and, according to early indications, on the judiciary itself. This is a popular constitutional movement that has stayed away from the courtrooms, whose major contribution has been to reorient the

225. Florida v. U.S. Dep’t of Health & Human Serv., Nos. 11-11021, 2011 WL 3519178 at *51 (11th Cir. Aug. 12, 2011).

226. Id. at 171.

227. See, e.g., Jeffrey Toobin, Partners: Will Clarence and Virginia Thomas Succeed in Killing Obama’s Health-Care Plan? NEW YORKER, Aug. 29, 2011, at 41 (“[Justice] Thomas’s triumph over the health-care law and its supporters is by no means assured, but it is now tantalizingly within reach.”). But see Laurence Tribe, On Health Care, Justice Will Prevail, N.Y. TIMES, Feb. 8, 2011, at A27 (arguing that “this law’s constitutionality is open and shut” and predicting the Supreme Court will uphold the law, probably by an 8-1 vote). As Mike Dorf has observed, it is hard to know whether Professor Tribe truly believes this prediction or whether he “is simply trying to work the refs.” Mike Dorf, Tribe, the Health Care Mandate, and Legal Realism, DORFONLAW, (Feb. 9, 2011, 12:16 AM), <http://www.dorfonlaw.org/2011/02/tribe-health-care-mandate-and-legal.html>. See also Erwin Chemerinsky, The Health Care Law is Constitutional, SCOTUSBLOG (Aug. 5, 2011, 5:57 PM), <http://www.scotusblog.com/2011/08/the-health-care-law-is-constitutional> (“If this issue had not become so intensely partisan, it would be easy to predict the result in the Supreme Court. But even taking the politics into account, I predict that the Court will uphold the law by an eight-to-one margin.”).

228. Randy E. Barnett, Commandeering the People: Why the Individual Health Insurance Mandate is Unconstitutional, 5 N.Y.U. J. L. & LIBERTY 581, 635 (2010).

role of the Constitution in contemporary political practice, yet one of its most lasting influences might very well be helping to create the conditions necessary for a landmark Supreme Court ruling striking down the core of the health care bill.

B. The Constitution Outside the Courts

Aside from possible developments in the courts that might be linked to Tea Party activism, there is also the question of the impact of the Tea Party's constitutional agenda on the movement's preferred terrain: Constitutional debate and practice outside the courts. Unlike the realm of courts and constitutional doctrine, where victories and losses tend to be clearly defined, the achievements and failures of a popular constitutional movement are generally less susceptible to measurement. Nonetheless, there are certain indications by which the impact of the Tea Party as a constitutional movement might be considered.

One might, for instance, simply note that the American people seem to be talking about the Constitution far more than they did before the Tea Party appeared on the scene. Although I am not aware of polling data on this point, discussion of the history and meaning of the Constitution has become more prominent as the press has sought to make sense of the emergence of the Tea Party. Controversial Tea Party claims about the meaning of the Constitution regularly sparked media coverage and responses by lawyers and scholars. The Constitution also became a central talking point during the 2010 elections, particularly by those candidates who sought to curry favor with Tea Party groups. Politicians regularly carried their pocket Constitutions with them to the lectern, ready to wave it and read from it at appropriate moments. The decision of the new Republican majority in the House to read the text of the Constitution on the floor in early 2011, and the ensuing debate over what parts would and would not be read, had the effect of launching yet another public discussion about the Constitution. Tea Partiers often note the increased interest in the Constitution with more than a little bit of pride. "More people read the U.S. Constitution in the last 6 months than in last 50 years," Texas Governor Perry announced last year.²²⁹ He was exaggerating, but perhaps not too much. Polls consistently show that historically few Americans have spent much time with their 229. Jonathan Martin, Rick Perry taps into fear of Washington, POLITICO (Mar. 2, 2010), <http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0310/33741.html>.

founding documents.²³⁰ New York Times legal reporter Adam Liptak wrote, the Tea Party movement “has made the Constitution central to the national conversation.”²³¹

The Tea Party movement also appears to have been quite successful in “selling” originalism to a broader audience.²³² Polls show a spike in public support for originalism coinciding with the ascendancy of the Tea Party. Starting in 2003, Quinnipiac University conducted periodic surveys of the following question:

Which comes closer to your point of view: A) In making decisions, the Supreme Court should only consider the original intentions of the authors of the Constitution or B) In making decisions, the Supreme Court should consider changing times and current realities in applying the principles of the Constitution?²³³

Between 2003 and 2008, support for view A hovered around 40%, view B around 50%.²³⁴ Then, in the April 2010 poll, the numbers basically reversed. Forty-nine percent of respondents favored original intention, with “changing times” dropping ten points from the 2008 poll to 42% percent.²³⁵ (Among Tea Party supporters, 78% favored original intention.)²³⁶

230. See, e.g., MICHAEL KAMMEN, A MACHINE THAT WOULD GO OF ITSELF: THE CONSTITUTION IN AMERICAN CULTURE (1986) (emphasizing historically low levels of constitutional literacy); Lepore, supra note 73.

231. Adam Liptak, Tea-ing Up the Constitution, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 14, 2010, at WK1.

232. Jamal Greene’s article Selling Originalism analyzes the popularity of originalism in terms of the “market for constitutional methodologies.” Greene, Selling, supra note 46, at 660.

233. Obama’s Bounce Goes Flat, Quinnipiac University National Poll Finds; But Voters Confident He Will Pick Good Judge, QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY 15 (Apr. 21, 2010), <http://www.quinnipiac.edu/images/polling/us/us04212010.doc>. Note that option A is a rather stark version of originalism, focusing squarely on original intent (as opposed to original public meaning) and requiring that original intention be the only acceptable basis for constitutional interpretation. Most originalists would not insist on such exclusivity of methodology.

234. Id.

	2003	2005 (May)	2005 (July)	2007	2008
View A	39%	42%	44%	43%	40%
View B	54%	51%	50%	48%	52%

235. Id.

236. Id.

While it would be inaccurate to identify any Tea Party political success as a mark of achievement for its constitutional agenda, the two are obviously intertwined. (Indeed, this is one of the defining contributions of the Tea Party: to inject constitutional considerations into what has previously been understood as questions of politics and policy.) The blending of the Tea Party's political and constitutional agendas is particularly evident when Tea Party candidates running for office campaigned on their constitutional views, and when these same people, when in office, justify their policy decisions on constitutional grounds. Thus, the 2010 election results and the early actions of the new Congress should be seen, at least in part, as achievements of the Tea Party as a constitutional movement. The Tea Party's strength was also clearly evident when the House voted to repeal the health care law, with supporters of repeal citing prominently the constitutional question as a central basis for their votes. And while the repeal measure was defeated in the Senate, the Senate's reconsideration of the health care law included Judiciary Committee hearings on its constitutionality—something that was not done the first time through. With the rise of the Tea Party, and particularly in the wake of the 2010 midterm elections, the tenor in Washington has clearly changed. The political center of gravity has moved, in ways symbolic and substantive, in the direction of the Tea Party. All of this has provided a more prominent platform for Tea Party leaders to promote their vision of the Constitution.

It is important to keep in mind that one of the strengths of Tea Party constitutionalism is that it allows for small-scale victories for its participants.²³⁷ Organizing a constitution study group, working to elect a candidate who shares Tea Party constitutional commitments,

237. Because the Tea Party has been able to build a constitutional movement that is largely indifferent or antagonistic toward the courts, it is not clear what the impact of a Supreme Court ruling striking down part or all of the health care law would be on the Tea Party. Such a ruling would clearly be viewed favorably by the Tea Party. A 2010 poll found that 80% of self-identified Tea Party supporters approved of the lawsuits challenging the health care law. Id. But litigation victories are not always victories from the perspective of movement mobilization. They can have the effect of dissipating energy from extrajudicial activism. They might encourage Tea Party activists to see litigation as a more important tool in their constitutional toolkit, with uncertain benefits to the movement. Ironically, then, to have the Supreme Court resolve the central issue around which the Tea Party has mobilized its constitutional challenge to the status quo would not necessarily be a victory for the Tea Party as a constitutional movement. In fact, a Supreme Court ruling upholding the health care law might very well serve the purposes of the movement more than a Court decision striking the law down. As the aftermath of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) has shown, courtroom defeats can be valuable focal points for movement mobilization.

convincing a state legislature to pass a resolution denouncing federal overreach and asserting state sovereignty under the Tenth Amendment, lobbying Congress to simply do less (because much of what it had been doing was beyond its constitutional authority)—while none of these acts might be particularly dramatic in their own right, and while much of this can be dismissed as nothing more than symbolic politics, they are all, when viewed through the lens of popular constitutional mobilization, achievements of Tea Party constitutionalism. Taken together, they add up to a significant achievement for a grassroots movement in an era supposedly dominated by popular deference to judicial supremacy on matters of constitutional interpretation.

Conclusion

In this Article I have sought to shed new light on the nature and significance of the Tea Party's campaign to reconceptualize the role of the Constitution in American life and politics. Most accounts of the Tea Party have focused on content of the claims its adherents have made about the Constitution, many of which call for quite radical breaks from constitutional tradition. Yet largely missing from these accounts is a recognition of the ways in which the Tea Party has been able draw upon the Constitution to energize and mobilize large numbers of American citizens. The basic constitutional claims that have emerged from the Tea Party are often controversial, but they are not particularly new. But the variety of mechanisms by which the Tea Party has sought to promulgate these claims and to make them compelling to the people and their elected representatives is distinctive, if not unprecedented on in recent American history. It is in these mechanisms of constitutional practice—educational outreach efforts, state-level mobilization, and national electoral politics—that we see the way the working parts of the Tea Party as a constitutional movement.

The Tea Party should be understood as a quintessential example of popular constitutionalism. Movement activists have located tactics of constitutional claim-making that function largely outside the realm of the courts, that retain some sense of constitutional reasoning as distinct from pure politics, and that energize and mobilize significant numbers of people. This is no small achievement. Whether similar tactics might yield comparable results for a movement with different ideological commitments is not clear, as the Tea Party case study indicates that popular constitution mobilization might serve certain constitutional claims better than others. Agree or disagree with the Tea Party on the substance of its vision of the Constitution, scholars should give more attention to what the movement reveals about the dynamics of constitutional mobilization.